The increase in private ownership of articles once thought of as luxuries is a good index of America's steadily rising standard of living. 1950 prices of mass-produced items which achieve the largest sales are approximately as follows:

Home	$8,000
Car	1,500
Television set	200
Refrigerator	180
Washing machine	150
Vacuum cleaner	50
Radio	25

Income bracket:	Number of families
Under $1,000	$4,100,000
$1,000–$2,000	5,600,000
$2,000–$3,000	7,900,000
$3,000–$4,000	8,000,000
$4,000–$5,000	5,000,000
$5,000–$6,000	3,100,000
$6,000–$10,000	3,800,000
Over $10,000	1,100,000

Better distribution of American income over the years has meant that more than half of the Nation's 39,000,000 families are now in the middle-income bracket of $2,000 to $5,000 a year. Economists have found that the lowest fifth of the population had an increase in purchasing power of 51 percent from 1941 to 1948, while the top fifth increased only 18 percent.

Editors Support Congress Study

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, educators and editors across the Nation are taking an interest in the worthy endeavor of the Committee for Congress, of 1060 National Press Building, Washington, D. C., to strengthen our Nation with a better knowledge of Congress and its work.

This is a necessary endeavor in normal times, but it is even more important in times of crisis that we should do everything possible to create a better understanding of our Congress.

Some of our friends who are right on the scene here in the National Capital say that it is even difficult for them to understand all the functions of Congress, and for that reason it is even more important that special steps be taken to clarify the work of Congress and its Members. I, therefore, ask leave to insert this material in the RECORD. It follows:

THE MEXIA DAILY NEWS,
Mexia, Tex., December 10, 1950.

Mr. HARMON NICHOLS,
United Press Washington Bureau, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. NICHOLS: A few days ago we had a dispatch of yours over the UP wire telling about the Committee for Congress and mentioning a publication called Your Congress Magazine.

Would you please put me in touch with the proper individual on the magazine so that I can subscribe to it—I, too, would appreciate an opportunity to find out what goes on, and perhaps to pass along to our local school officials the fact that a group of newspapermen have such a publication.

I haven't looked into it, but I imagine that our schools aren't doing much to tell the kids what Congress is all about these days.

Sincerely yours,

E. C. (ERNIE) DEANE.

COMMITTEE FOR CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1950.

MR. E. C. DEANE,
Editor and General Manager, the Mexia Daily News, Mexia, Tex.

DEAR MR. DEANE: Harmon Nichols has handed to me your letter of December 10, 1950, in which you made the interesting observation that "I imagine that our schools here aren't doing much to tell the kids what Congress is all about these days."

That observation corroborates our general findings on the subject, but I am afraid that our schools and school officials are not entirely to blame. The fact is, that there is no readily accessible material available that provides in graphic, easy-to-read, and understandable form study material on the specific and actual work and functions of the Congress of the United States and its Members.

It is this hiatus in our educational system that we are endeavoring to correct, through the formation of the Committee for Congress by a group of outstanding newspaper and magazine correspondents and authors, and its Congress study council program. We are producing the Your Congress Magazine on a quarterly basis for the present, and will attempt to supply explanatory articles on how Congress operates, and what it is doing.

We will keep you fully informed on the project as it progresses, and are more than happy that you are interested in it. We have invited Mr. Nichols to serve on the advisory committee, on which leaders of all segments of the American economy will be represented.

We are forwarding requested material and any additional inquiries can be sent to the National Headquarters, 1060 National Press Building, Washington 4, D. C. ME 2214.

With sincere thanks for your interest.

Yours truly,

HAL J. MILLER,
Editor, Your Congress Magazine, Executive Director, Committee for Congress, sponsor of Congress Study Council.

Hon. Lyndon Johnson's Appeal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ED GOSSETT
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, the junior Senator from Texas, the Honorable LYNDON JOHNSON, recently made a notable speech to which reference is made in an editorial in my home-town paper, that is, the Wichita (Tex.) Daily Times.

This editorial is worthy of reproduction in the RECORD and I offer it for insertion. We should all subordinate profits and politics to the terrible needs of the hour. Senator JOHNSON is to be commended for his efforts to bring our country to a realization of her peril. The Times editorial of December 19, 1950, follows:

HON. LYNDON JOHNSON'S APPEAL

The Second World War brought into our language some phrases we do not like to remember. "Too little and too late" was one of them. "Wishful thinking" was another. Because of them, a good many fine young men who might be alive are dead.

In the present emergency, another fateful phrase has become current in some circles in Washington. "Wait and see." Ever since the Korean trouble began in June there has been those in high places, wishful thinkers, who thought we could afford to postpone arming at full strength, who thought the trouble might be less dangerous than it has become, and who wanted to dally and temporize.

Senator LYNDON JOHNSON of Texas has paid his respects to the wait-and-see crowd, in language both brutal and bitter; by virtue of the position he holds, as chairman of the Senate Military Preparedness Subcommittee, the Texas Senator knows, perhaps better than anyone else in Washington, how far short of the need our program is, and what egregious folly we are pursuing in thinking we can wait. We are at war, the Senator says, in a conflict in which our very survival is at stake, and we are not getting ready to make war as we must.

The Senator sees our needs as, first, a global plan of strategy; second, full manpower mobilization; third, economic mobilization; fourth, a prompt and emphatic end to the wait-and-see policy; and, finally, hard-driving leadership.

Why have we not moved faster? A partial answer is, politics. Another partial answer has been the inability to realize the temper of the American people. One reason, the Senator suggests, is that we have been more afraid of doing too much than of doing too little.

The result is that, instead of a wall of armed might, we have what the Senator describes as a chicken-wire fence. And he added:

"This is not World War II all over again. This is a struggle without precedent in human experience. The military concepts and the domestic policies which won World War II are not applicable to this struggle in which we are now engaged. Obviously, we need new approaches, new plans, new goals; just as obviously we do not have them."

In the relatively brief time that he has been a Senator, LYNDON JOHNSON has gained, to a degree almost unprecedented, the confidence and respect of the membership. They have learned that he is no alarmist, no idle talker, and that when he speaks of the preparedness task, he knows what he is saying. He said some things that needed to be said. Congress and the administration must heed his words.

Thou Shalt Not

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES W. WADSWORTH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech broadcast by me on December 15, 1950, the day reserved for commemoration of the adoption of the Bill of Rights:

THOU SHALT NOT

The story of the Bill of Rights is simple. It ought to be told again and again. I shall now endeavor to tell it as briefly as possible. It will be recalled that the Thirteen Colonies, or States, as they came to be known, after winning their independence from Great Britain in the War of the Revolution, endeavored to live together for 6 or 7 years in a confederation whose principal governing agency was a Congress composed of Members elected by the several States. That Congress possessed very slight powers and there was no effective executive officer of the confederation. The result was that frictions and misunderstandings broke out among the States. Some of them erected tariff barriers around their borders. Each had its own currency, most of it worthless. Each could regulate practically all its relations with its neighbors. At times those regulations were so severe that an outbreak of violence was threatened. In other words, instead of coming closer together after winning their liberty, the States, to a very alarming degree, began to drift apart. Had this trend persisted unchecked the results would have been tragic. There would have been no American Nation. But in 1787, responsive to a resolution adopted by the Congress of the confederation, a convention met with instructions to study the articles of confederation and to make recommendations for their revision. As you all know, that Convention met, with George Washington as its presiding officer, and with Delegates from the States present—a most distinguished gathering. Before they proceeded far they came to a realization that mere revision of the Articles of Confederation would not suffice. So they went to work to write a Constitution, a basic law upon which to found a Federal Government clothed with sufficient power to manage national affairs. I need not attempt to describe at this time the provisions of that Constitution as submitted to the several States. Suffice it to say that it was a remarkable document and still lives as such. However, a great many Americans of that day had an instinctive dread of overconcentration of power in a Central Government. They feared that such a Government might take unto itself, step by step, a despotic power over the individual citizen. A great many of them insisted that while power should be given to the Federal Government to do certain things it was vital that that Government should be forbidden the doing of certain things which would deprive the citizen of his liberty. They demanded that a Bill of Rights be added to the Constitution.

As the discussion proceeded throughout the year 1788 it was conceded that ratification of the new Constitution by the requisite nine States was very doubtful. As a result, there finally emerged from the debate what might be termed a gentleman's agreement between the contending parties. That agreement provided that immediately following the ratification of the new Constitution and the setting up of the new Federal Government, the First Congress would draft a Bill of Rights and submit it as soon as possible to the several States for ratification as a proposed addition to the Constitution. This agreement was largely responsible for the action of the States in approving the Constitution, confident, as they were, that the First Congress would see to it that the gap was filled. And so it was done. The First Congress submitted the Bill of Rights, containing 10 proposed amendments. Those 10 amendments were ratified with remarkable rapidity, indicating the measure of assurance which they gave to a people who dreaded the growth of despotism.

Now, let us see what those 10 amendments do. Remember, first, that the main body of the Constitution conferred powers upon the Federal Government—powers to be exercised by the Congress, by the Executive, and by the Judiciary—powers which were regarded as necessary for the conduct of an effective Federal Government. By contrast, the Bill of Rights says to that Government: "Thou shall not do certain things to us." For example, "Thou shalt not deprive us of the right to hold public meetings, to speak our minds, or to write out and circulate our opinions. Thou shalt not give preferential recognition to any church or religious denomination nor interfere with the right of an individual to worship as he pleases. Thou shalt not deprive any person of the right of trial by a jury of his peers nor to employ counsel for defense. Thou shalt not put a man under arrest and keep him in jail for months and months without trial. If he is to be brought to trial charged with a crime, it might be as the result of the action of a grand jury submitting an indictment; and the trial must be held promptly, no long delays, and the accused must not be compelled to testify against himself. Furthermore, that same accused, if acquitted by a jury of his peers, must not be tried a second time for the same offense." Compare, if you will, this protection of the rights of the individual in our country with what is going on in communistic countries today and you will realize the vital difference. The Bill of Rights goes on to say to the Government: "Thou shalt not take away from any individual his lawful property without due compensation. Thou shalt not break into the house of a citizen and seize his papers and effects unless a legal warrant, supported by oath or affirmation, shall be issued by legally constituted authority."

These "thou-shalt-nots," and a few others which I need not recite, were intended to protect the individual citizen against reckless attacks upon his life, liberty, or property. And then, finally, to make it absolutely clear that government derives all its power from the people, they ended up the Bill of Rights with the famous article 10, which reads: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." In other words, "No more power unless we give it to you." That article 10 is the last word, the conclusive "thou-shalt-not," addressed to the Government. With it the story is complete. Down through the years some attempts have been made to trespass upon the sacred right of the citizen. They have failed, but similar attempts may be made in the future. They will fail if we teach our children and our grandchildren the real meaning and the vital importance of the Bill of Rights. I say "teach our children and our grandchildren" because I know, as you all know, that liberty does not survive among a careless, uninformed people. It is earned first by the people themselves. Having earned it, they must watch over it lest it be taken away from them by a higher power. Let this thing be taught over and over again in our homes, our schools, our colleges. Telling an old story again and again may seem unnecessary but the history of the human race demonstrates that the truth cannot be told too often.

Spreading the Blame

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include an article from the Philadelphia Bulletin:

SPREADING THE BLAME—IT MAY BE THAT THE ISOLATIONISTS THEMSELVES HAVE LOST PUBLIC'S CONFIDENCE

(By Ralph W. Page)

WASHINGTON.—The new coalition of isolationist Senators keeps reiterating that the country has lost confidence in the Secretary of State because he didn't follow their advice.

It does not seem to occur to them that it is quite possible that, on the contrary, the public has even less confidence in them. Certainly I can find no enthusiasm even in Republican circles for the Taft-Dirksen-Knowland ballyhoo.

Their contention has been that we should let Europe stew in its Communist juice—but that we should have given Chiang Kai-shek sufficient aid to defeat the Chinese revolution. That our military commanders were unanimous that this could not be done without either an American army or complete American control and command of the Kuomintang Government is totally disregarded.

Now they say that the reason the Chinese attacked our forces in Korea is because we did not give further aid to the generalissimo.

A much better case can be made, however, for the proposition that we are subjected to this Chinese fury for the sole reason that we did support him.

Following the war all China was in revolt. It was—and is—an agrarian revolution against the old feudal system and corruption. At that time the Chinese people considered America their first friend, and were congenitally hostile to Russia which had consistently encroached upon their territory for a century. Yalta certainly did not endear them to the Russians. For it was demands for further Russian seizures not American encroachments that are criticized.

In this situation the real American problem was to maintain the confidence of the Chinese people and keep their attention focused upon the inroads upon their sovereignty and economy by the Soviets.

Plenty of experienced and informed authorities urged this upon the State Department. But since, unfortunately, the reins of the revolt were in the hands of the Communists, these men and this policy were so pilloried and smeared by the McCarthy technique that it was hardly discussible on its merits. No attention was paid to the salient fact that we were not fighting communism, Chinese style, but Russian aggression.

The pressure was to wage war on this revolution. And in doing so instead of heading off the Kremlin we threw the population into its arms.

For whatever Senators may think of Chiang, the Chinese population considers him anathema.

In other words, we took the wrong side in the Chinese civil war with result we now face.

And it is this policy which the Senators endorsed and which they now follow up by putting the blame on Dean Acheson.

Insofar as it was able, under the din of the smear campaign, the Department was endeavoring to avoid conflict with the Chinese. It was recognized that Chiang was Russian bait and that, in fact, the Chinese would soon discover the evil interest of the Soviets if they were not diverted by fear or animosity toward us.

All this claque about a lack of confidence is pointed in the wrong direction. It should be aimed at the isolationists who started it.

Funds for Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GORDON CANFIELD
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a telegram from Thomas E. Prescott, president of the Passaic, N. J., Chamber of Commerce, concerning a proposal made by the chamber's board of directors on new Federal tax legislation to provide necessary funds for the defense program. The telegram follows:

PASSAIC, N. J., December 21, 1950.
Hon. GORDON CANFIELD,
House Office Building:

The board of directors of the Passaic Chamber of Commerce fully recognize the necessity of a $17,530,000,000 defense program on the part of the United States. They also realize that such defense preparations will cost vast sums of money a large part of which must be raised by pay-as-you-go taxation. However, they oppose those forms of new taxation which by their nature or by their designation, i. e., excess-profits tax, tend to become a fixed and permanent part of the tax structure or which serve as a disguise for social and economic reforms. Therefore, it was Resolved, That the directors of the Passaic Chamber of Commerce favor the imposition of a new Federal tax separate from all other taxes to be officially designated as an emergency defense tax with understanding that funds so raised be specifically earmarked solely for defense expenditures and with the further understanding that this special tax be terminated as and when the current emergency no longer exists. We respectfully urge your action along above lines.

THOMAS E. PRESCOTT,
President, Passaic Chamber of Commerce.

Decision To Send Troops to Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include my telegram to the Secretary of State on December 21, 1950:

The SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Who made the decision to send our Armed Forces into Korea? The Constitution vests exclusively in Congress the power to declare war, but Congress was not consulted.

In the December 13 issue of Human Events, Frank C. Hanighen said:

"From a well-informed source, we have received some interesting hitherto unpublished information about the original, ill-fated decision to land troops on the Korean Peninsula last June. There has always been a good deal of mystery about how the President reached the decision to send ground troops and engage in land warfare. Last summer, this column fathered various bits of evidence and hearsay which suggested that the military chiefs were either opposed or reluctant. (It is now known that they were inclined to adhere to a secret plan which limited retaliation to air bombing and naval blockade.) Generally, it has been believed that the responsibility for the landing was solely that of Truman and Acheson.

"Now comes word suggesting that there was a third partner in the decision. We hear from a usually well-informed source that President Truman paid a secret visit to Gen. George C. Marshall sometime in the 24 hours preceding the afternoon of June 26. According to this information, the President motored to the general's home at Leesburg, Va., about 35 miles from Washington. Although it is not explained why, instead, the general did not come to the White House. The President was reportedly absent from the Capital for about 4 hours. As such a motor journey should have consumed about an hour-and-a-half (down and back), there was ample time for a considerable review of the Korean situation. While our source gives no details about what was said at the meeting, we are justified in concluding that General Marshall urged or approved the plan for landing United States troops in Korea. It would, indeed, be surprising if Marshall's assent was not given, for it is well known that the President has long esteemed Marshall's military counsel. Finally, it was after this secret meeting that the President made the decision of June 26 to undertake the ill-starred Korean landing."

Were these three men who made this decision the same three that George Catlett Marshall wrote to when he said: "With one stroke of the pen, I have disarmed 29 Chinese Nationalist divisions." These were the 29 divisions guarding north China against Communist ingress through the passes in the north. Are these three men the same who decided to disarm our ally, the Chinese Republic? And, if so, are they wise and far-sighted enough today to take over the powers of Congress in dealing with foreign affairs and sending our men into war?

Former Congressman Samuel B. Pettengill, a profound student of our Constitution, and, during 8 years a Member of Congress, Democrat of Indiana, wrote an open letter to the press, urging a stop to Executive assumption of power to declare war and enter treaties not sanctioned by the Senate. He said:

"As soon as the newly elected Congress meets, the United States Senate should at once notify the world that for all time to come no act of a President, past, present, or future, agreeing or consenting to a permanent transfer of territory or property, or the forced migration of millions of people from one foreign power to another, will be recognized as valid by the United States unless and until the same has been ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

"In order to appease Stalin, Mr. Roosevelt repudiated the Atlantic Charter and every principle of international morality by agreeing to the transfer of the property and territory of China and Japan to Russia; he agreed to the transfer of German territory to Poland; of Polish territory to Russia; and God knows what else.

"This business of permitting a few officials to secretly commit American lives and treasure to battle without a congressional declaration of war, of appeasing one ally by transferring to it the territory of another ally, or the property and persons of its civilians, and of making permanent treaties with foreign powers, dictators, or bandits by executive agreement, must end—now.

"It must be intoxicating to three men to carve up the world, but every instinct of liberty and morality must revolt against it."

Mr. Acheson, as a Member of Congress, wishing to live up to the constitutional responsibilities vested in us, I ask for reply to the question: Whose decision was it that sent our troops into the Korean war? Is Mr. Hanighen's statement correct?

RALPH W. GWINN,
Member of Congress.

Dinosaur National Monument

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an article entitled "This Is Dinosaur," which was written by Mr. Devereux Butcher and printed in the National Parks magazine, October–December issue, 1950, of which he is the editor. May I recommend the reading of this article to my colleagues, as it describes a very interesting national monument, located in the States of Utah and Colorado. The following is the article:

As you reach the summit of Round Top, highest point on the ridge of Blue Mountain, the land drops away suddenly 3,000 feet, and like an eagle, you gaze down on the intricate, magnificent, turbulent landscape of Dinosaur National Monument. Below, and stretching eastward into the blue distance, are the pale canyons of the Yampa River gleaming with the color of ivory in the brilliant light of the midday sun. So snarled and twisted are those canyons that the river's main channel is hardly distinguishable; even at the oxbows near Harding's Hole, you must look carefully to find it. Nearest to Round Top is Castle Park, where the river makes a wide bend southward and then north. Here the clear, green water of the Yampa is visible until it enters the windings of Bear Canyon, from whence it soon joins the Green River at Pats Hole, a little to the west. The top of the famous Steamboat Rock, at Pats Hole, can be seen above the canyon's south rim, and just beyond, the dark red walls of Lodore Canyon, through which flows the Green River from the north.

You will go down to Pats Hole. A road plunges over the brink of Blue Mountain and enters Iron Springs Wash. Through juniper and pinion pine, it passes the head of Upper Pool Creek Canyon, rambles across sage-covered bench lands to drop into Sand Canyon and on across hot sage flats to wind down through Lower Pool Creek Canyon—red-walled, and grown with boxelder trees and cottonwoods. Here you stop to explore Whispering Cave and feel the cold, refreshing air that pours down through long gashes in the cave's room. The canyon makes an abrupt turn beyond the cave, and there before you, framed by the mouth of Pool Creek Canyon, stands the towering form of Steamboat Rock, symbol of Dinosaur National Monument.

Your destination on this day is the road's end, just below the junction of the Yampa and the Green. In a grove of boxelders, you make camp. The sun is sinking now, and its last rays make the Yampa's north ramparts blaze with the color of flame, while the shadows of advancing night deepen in the canyons. The silence of the wilderness is broken only by the gentle, steady, distant sound of rapids made by the Green, where it emerges from its Canyon of Lodore. A wide, clean sand bar along the river's bank is the ideal place to sleep.

All through the still night there is no sound except the echo of rapids. No air stirs, and the sand bars and canyon walls long hold the warmth of sunny hours. Steamboat Rock stands in massive silhouette against the stars, its top 800 feet above.

Through the Yampa's mouth, the sky becomes luminous, announcing the coming of day. Faintly, very faintly, detail shows on the broad eastward face of Steamboat Rock. Later, from high on the talus at the base of the cliff that forms the angle between the Yampa and Green, you look down on the meeting of the rivers. A rock wren scolds and white-throated swifts chatter as a pair of these graceful birds skim past on vibrant wings, now far below, now high above, and on up, to vanish over the very crests of the lofty crags.

Beyond and above Steamboat Rock, high peaks catch the first rays of the rising sun, and presently, with dramatic effect, the brilliant light shafts down Yampa Canyon, gilding the face of Steamboat. The meadows and boxelder groves at Pats Hole are yet in shade. Now the light reaches the Yampa's clear green mirror pools. Where the sun touches the pale rock of the Yampa Canyon, horizontal striations show on the smooth curves.

A rough dirt road winds its way north in the high country toward Harper's Corner. Beyond the gray sage the land dips a little, and you pass along through junipers and piñons and stop within 2 miles of the tip of the corner. It is hot now, even at this altitude of 7,500 feet above sea level. The sun is brilliant, although clouds hover above the Uinta Mountains far to the west. A trail climbs over several tree-clad hills and brings you toward the ever-narrowing tip of Harper's Corner. When the ridge pitches steeply down on each side, there are sudden and unexpected views east and west through the trees. To the right, and so far down that it all looks like a toy landscape, is Pats Hole. There towers Steamboat Rock, the Green winding around its prow. There is the twisting canyon of the Yampa in view over the knife edge of the rock, and there, easily visible from this high point, is the Canyon of Lodore. To the left is Whirlpool Canyon. Farther on, the ridge continues to narrow, and the trail comes out of the trees. You may go on to the very tip if you wish, but to get there you will cross a neck of rock only 20 inches wide. Here you stand in one spot and, with a slight turn of the head, look down an almost sheer drop of 2,800 feet to the river on each side. Where the river bends around the corner is the place a dam is planned to be built. All of the magnificent wild natural canyons to the right will be submerged under 500 feet of water. Only 300 feet of Steamboat Rock will show above. The superbly beautiful windings of the Yampa will be submerged. Gone will be the bright green pools, the peaceful groves of boxelders, willows, and cottonwoods, and no more will be heard the distant echoing of rapids.

To reach Rainbow and Island Parks, you will take a road west of the monument, winding north, then east through rolling ranch lands and sage-covered range land. Climbing it will bring you to the top of a hill from the base of which stretches the lowlands of Island Park, with the precipitous wall of the Yampa Plateau beyond to the south. Across Island Park flows the Green River, just emerging from Whirlpool Canyon. After the turbulence of the canyon, the river rests awhile, meandering among green islands bordered by big cottonwoods. Soon it is to become turbulent again as it plunges into Split Mountain Canyon. From your vantage point on the hill, you see the spectacular gap of Whirlpool and the forbidding chasm of Split Mountain Canyon.

From the Rupel Ranch in Island Park, you go to the mouth of Whirlpool Canyon by crossing a mile of meadow, and then following the river's sandy shore; and you approach the entrance to Split Mountain Canyon by a road to Rainbow Park, and then following the bars along the river's bank for a mile or more.

At Split Mountain Gorge, to the south, the Green River bids farewell to the monument and its wild canyons to flow peacefully through green farms on its way southward through Utah to its junction with the Colorado. But if the river bids farewell to the canyons here at the gorge, this is where you enter afoot, to explore, perhaps alone, its grandeur and solitude. A road terminates at the gorge, and a rock formation on each side of the river comes down to the water, blocking your passage. You must climb high along the west bank, and follow deer trails upriver. If you go in midafternoon, you will find the red canyon wall, 2,000 feet above you, casting welcome shade across your trail. Below, the river washes the very foot of the cliff, and in places, boils and hisses and rises in waves of foaming rapids. At the bend, you come down to the water's edge and rock-hop, eventually following a series of sandy beaches where the going is easy and restful after the hard climb along talus and cliff. This is the site of another dam proposed to be built inside the national monument. The glorious sense of solitude you are enjoying, the peace and beauty and quiet of the place, may some day soon be shattered by exploding dynamite and the roar of machinery. Rapids will be silenced, and upstream from here, through the length of Split Mountain Canyon, into Rainbow and Island Parks, and on through Whirlpool Canyon to the foot of the dam at Harper's Corner, all will be submerged beneath a reservoir up to 200 feet deep.

For a glimpse of the Green River, at the north end of the monument, go to Maybell, Colo., and from there take the road northwest for 60 miles across the rolling expanse of sage flats and juniper forests to where the river leaves the open country of Brown's Park to plunge through the Gate of Lodore. At road's end, a walk across a small plateau brings you to the brink of a cliff high above the quiet Green. Just beyond is the magnificent Gate of Lodore—the entrance to the awe-inspiring, sheer-walled red canyon. Here the Green starts its turbulent journey through the national monument. This, like the rest of the monument, will some day become a destination for tourists from all parts of the Nation and from foreign countries, if preserved as nature made it. But even here, 15 miles, as the crow flies, from the dam site at Harpers Corner, the effect of the dam would be felt, for the reservoir would inundate the Canyon of Lodore to a depth of 200 feet at this, its upper end.

In the nearby towns they will tell you the monument is inaccessible. Most of the local people believe that, and as a result, few of them have ever seen it. Tell them you have been there, describe what you have seen, and they will look at you as though you had dropped in from outer space.

The area is accessible, but not easily explored. The day before we visited Pats Hole, seven cars had been there. On our way out, we met a sedan full of tourists going in. The wife of a rancher, who lives in the monument down near Pats Hole, has just bought a big new Buick. Every time the lady wants to go to town, she drives that heavy car out over the sandy, rocky road. Yes, Pats Hole is accessible, as are many other parts of the monument, and if you want to see the reservation you can; but don't wait. Those magnificent canyons may not remain much longer as nature made them.

Here's what has happened: In 1938, the canyons were set aside to be preserved in perpetuity as one of this Nation's great and spectacular natural exhibits of undisturbed scenic grandeur. During World War II, engineers of the Bureau of Reclamation entered the area in search of dam sites for water storage and power development. They gave notice, thereafter, that two sites, Echo Park (the site at Harpers Corner) and Split Mountain Canyon, were essential to the water and power development plan for the Upper Basin of the Colorado River system. The Green and Yampa Rivers are part of that system. Since World War II, Bureau of Reclamation engineers have brought their proposal to the people of Utah and western Colorado. From the engineers' representations, the people in the region are convinced that these dams will provide the primary storage and diversion point for irrigation water; that they are needed to provide storage in the Upper Basin to meet apportionment of water to Arizona and California, under the Colorado River compact; and that sufficient power will not be available except by construction of Echo Park Dam. Because of these beliefs, the people of Utah, particularly the communities in the vicinity of the monument, are now clamoring for the construction of these two dams. The "western bloc" in House and Senate hears that clamor, and is ruled by it, instead of by facts.

The facts are: (1) all information released up to now indicates that water for central Utah has been programed to come from Flaming Gorge Dam to be constructed upstream from the monument; (2) that Glen Canyon Reservoir on the Colorado River is the one from which water will be released to States downstream under the Colorado River compact, and this together with water from storage reservoirs upstream, other than the two proposed for the monument, will meet the compact agreement adequately; and (3) that all the necessary power can be generated at dams already proposed as alternates, at sites other than those in the monument.

The Colorado River compact provides that the upper-basin States shall deliver to the lower-basin States 75,000,000 acre-feet of water every 10 consecutive years, and that 7,500,000 acre-feet shall be apportioned each year to the upper-basin States for consumptive use. This requires 48,500,000 acre-feet of storage.

Clarifying the compact, Commissioner of Reclamation Michael W. Straus wrote the author, September 19, 1950, in part, as follows: "The 48,500,000 acre-feet of storage is our best estimate of the total amount of storage capacity which will be required to permit beneficial consumptive use of the 7,500,000 acre-feet allotted to the upper-basin States, while at the same time complying with the provisions of article III (d). In arriving at this amount of storage capacity, there must be taken into consideration such items as sediment deposition in the reservoir areas, net evaporation from the reservoir areas, operation of the reservoirs for multiple purposes, and similar items."

Because dam construction within any national park or monument is a violation of the national policy of complete protection of primeval conditions within such reservations, those interested in defending the national park and monument system against commercial and engineering raids, have asked that the two dams be omitted from the upper-basin program. (Let me emphasize: They are opposing only 2 dams of the 20 or more big projects proposed for the upper basin.) Secretary of the Interior Oscar L. Chapman, therefore, held a hearing on April 3, 1950, in Washington, D. C., so that both sides might express themselves concerning the two Dinosaur Monument proposals. The Secretary had agreed that as a result of testimony presented, he would decide whether or not the policy of the Department would favor the construction of these dams.

Officials of the National Park Service and representatives of conservation, nature protection, and wilderness preservation groups spoke in defense of the long-standing policy of the National Park Service; while officials of the Bureau of Reclamation, mayors, and representatives of chambers of commerce, and Senators and Congressmen from Utah and Colorado spoke for the dams. On June 27, Secretary Chapman's policy-shattering decision favoring the dams was announced.

Immediately following that decision I made plans to go to Utah and Colorado to get, at first hand, the proponent's side of the story. Was all this talk about the need for water based on a real need? Why was there so much demand for power development in a region so sparsely inhabited?

I wanted also to visit Dinosaur National Monument to see for myself whether the area really contained a superb exhibit of nature as some said, or whether it was of inferior quality or perhaps essentially duplicated elsewhere in the park and monument system.

In 6 weeks I traveled 3,700 miles in the two States, and wherever there was opportunity I talked with the people. They ranged from mayors and newspapermen to grocery-store clerks. Conversations showed a great deal of confusion in the minds of the people regarding Bureau of Reclamation plans.

There was a general feeling that this is "a fight between east and west," to quote the local press. Actually, this problem, like dozens of others that have occurred during the past 50 years, is a matter of protecting a unit of the national park system, and, therefore, the system as a whole. People from coast to coast, not just easterners, are striving to defend the monument.

Most people not in official positions thought there were only two dams to be built—the two in the national monument—and that from these would come all the power and water needed. According to the Bureau of Reclamation, these two dams are primarily for power development. Some understood there were other dams planned for the upper basin, but the number of these dams varied from two to three to nine or so. The names of the proposed Glen Canyon and Flaming Gorge Dams were familiar to a few. Actually, the Bureau has suggested over 20 projects for the upper basin alone. The Bureau admits that the exact number cannot be determined at this time.

In Utah's Central Valley I found there is desperate need for more water. At Salt Lake City and southward to such towns as Nephi, populations are growing fast and industries rapidly expanding. At Nephi, in the summer of 1949, for instance, the mayor received up to 16 telephone calls a day urging immediate action to get more water. Like the people of New York City recently, they did not have enough water for cooking and washing. No part of our country should remain under hardship like that, if it is humanly possible to remedy. Flaming Gorge Reservoir will take care of this Central Valley need, as the Bureau of Reclamation plans.

One Central Valley newspaper editor said he intended to write an article on the Dinosaur dams. Conversation brought out that he knew nothing about the subject except that the Park Service had expressed opposition to the construction of two dams, which the people of his community thought they needed. He finally admitted he had to read up on it. The Bureau of Reclamation is not planning to bring water to the Central Valley from the Dinosaur dams, but from Uinta Basin streams, and this may be supplemented by water from Flaming Gorge Dam. No one is opposing construction of Flaming Gorge Dam. May I ask how can people know the truth, if the men whose job it is to shape public opinion are themselves ignorant of the facts?

As for any understanding of the national policy governing the national parks and monuments, this I found almost wholly lacking everywhere. In the course of conversation with the mayor of a small Colorado town near the monument, I pointed out that, if these two dams do go in, the many pending threats to other parks and monuments will receive impetus. He said he had heard of no other threats, and asked what they were. When I told him of the Army engineers' scheme to build a dam that would flood 20,000 acres in Glacier National Park, and one that would fill the wonderful caverns of Mammoth Cave National Park, of the Bureau of Reclamation's plan to turn Grand Canyon National Monument and 18 miles along Grand Canyon National Park's boundary into a reservoir by building the proposed Bridge Canyon Dam in Arizona, of eight bills introduced in the Eightieth Congress to permit logging of Olympic National Park's incomparable rain forest, and so on, he said that he considered we had a strong argument against the Dinosaur dams. The general public simply is not informed about these things. Of course, Bernard DeVoto's article in a recent issue of the Saturday Evening Post has reached a fairly wide audience and has helped to create enlightenment. I am certain that if the public were aware of the constant efforts of exploitive interests to invade and destroy our wonderful national parks and monuments, there would be few if any such selfish efforts made, and the reservations would be forever secure.

At the nearby community of Vernal, in Utah, there is greater interest in construction of the Dinosaur dams than anywhere else. It is true that there are phosphate and asphalt deposits near by, and if power can be made available, these can be mined; but the huge dam planned for Flaming Gorge can provide adequate electricity. It is not generally known, even in Vernal, that from the Flaming Gorge Reservoir, water will be distributed to the central valley, along with water from the Uinta Mountains, some of which will be diverted to Vernal and other communities in that part of the State.

A gas station attendant at Vernal summed up in one sentence all the conversations I had with people in that town. He said, "What we are interested in is a business boom."

In the West, undue emphasis has been given the potential recreational benefits anticipated from artificial lakes. The reservoirs that would flood Dinosaur's canyons are being compared with Lake Mead by some proponents. Reservoirs with fluctuating shore lines provide good fishing in their first years, usually declining thereafter. Fishing on Lake Mead is diminishing today. How long could good fishing, the chief attraction at newly established reservoirs, be expected to last in the Dinosaur lakes? Most people who come to fish at such reservoirs are local people. They add no wealth to local coffers. On the other hand, consider the national parks and monuments—those superb, unmatched areas of primeval nature. They attract people from all over the country, and tourists leave their dollars. National parks are big business. Contrast this with the temporary character of money from dam construction, and the meager benefits that may accrue from reservoir fishing.

The Bureau of Reclamation has come bearing gifts and great promises of wealth. The people concerned should look this "gift horse" in the mouth. Those who advocate turning Dinosaur into a recreational area like Lake Mead should appreciate the fallacy of substituting secondary artificial recreation, that is available in many other places, for primary natural recreational assets that are unique. More than a hundred potential projects are outlined in the Bureau of Reclamation's Colorado River report. These would convert nearly all of the canyons and valleys of the Colorado Basin into a series of reservoirs possessing almost identical recreational potentialities. The Missouri, the Columbia, the Ohio and other big river systems are slated for the same treatment, while the Tennessee is already dammed. How much pulling power will Dinosaur hold for tourists if it should comprise just two of literally hundreds of similar artificial lakes? If Dinosaur is left unspoiled, the unique canyons of the Yampa and Green will remain a superbly magnificent attraction to the people of every State. Such untouched scenic grandeur is becoming progressively scarce. For a fraction of the cost of the two dams, the Park Service could provide facilities to serve the public. When that has been done, the railroads, bus lines and airlines will advertise it and attract wealth to the communities. That the monument is not now ready for the general public and being advertised, is as much, if not more, the fault of the local people than anyone else. Since they are the ones who stand to benefit most in a financial way, and are eager for a business boom, why have they not long ago urged their representatives in Congress to provide the Park Service with funds to develop the area?

Officials of the Bureau of Reclamation are using every means to win local support for the Dinosaur dam sites. That dam construction there would wipe out an area that can someday become one of the Nation's great national parks, and would endanger the future protection of the entire park and monument system, is of no concern to them.

In 1936, when the enlargement of Dinosaur National Monument was being proposed, the Bureau of Reclamation was not considering dams at Echo Park and Split Mountain, but rather had proposed a dam at Brown's Park at the north end of the monument. The Presidential proclamation of 1938, establishing the canyons as part of the monument, includes a specific reservation for this Brown's Park Dam. It is a matter of record that the Bureau of Reclamation did not propose to build the other two dams at that earlier date, that they did not make an investigation of the presently proposed dam sites until 1942, and that, so far as has been determined, the first correspondence between the Bureau and the National Park Service concerning the Echo Park and Split Mountain sites was written in 1943. It has been asserted that Dinosaur National Monument is subject to the authority of the Federal Power Act because of the Brown's Park reservation in the 1938 proclamation. Mr. Horace M. Albright, a former director of the National Park Service, president of the American Planning and Civic Association and a member of the Board of Trustees of the National Parks Association, submitted the following testimony concerning the Federal Power Act at the Secretary's recent hearing. His evidence read in part as follows:

"Congress by its legislation does not contemplate invasion of these national parks and monuments and it is against the policy of Congress to plan and construct these Echo Park and Split Mountain Dams in Dinosaur National Monument. When Congress had the water power bill under consideration just after the First World War, powers were proposed for the Federal Power Commission that would authorize dams, reservoirs, etc., in national park and monument areas. The bill passed both Houses of Congress, with this broad power included in it."

Congress, on March 3, 1921, amended the Federal Water Power Act to provide that thereafter no permit or other authorization shall be granted for reservoirs or other works for storage or carriage of water within the limits as then constituted of any national park or national monument without specific authority of Congress. The language of the amendment is comprehensive and absolute, and its meaning clear. In any event, all possible doubt as to the purpose of the act would be resolved by its legislative history. In calling up the bill in the House, Representative Esch stated (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 66th Cong., 3d sess., vol. 60, pt. 4, p. 4204):

"Mr. Speaker, the object of the bill is to modify the Federal Water Power Act so as to eliminate from its provisions national parks and national monuments. When this act was originally passed we supposed we had sufficiently safeguarded national parks and monuments so that there would not be constructed therein any water power or reclamation projects. * * * The Secretary of the Interior had great doubt as to the policy of giving to a commission control over national parks and monuments in the matter of water-power development. * * * An understanding was reached whereby the bill was to be introduced at this session eliminating the parks and monuments from the operation of the Federal Power Act, and this bill carries out that understanding."

Since the 1921 act was, by its terms, restricted to areas embraced within national parks and national monuments on the date of the act, it was necessary, until 1935, to include in proposed legislation for establishing or extending national parks or national monuments a provision to prohibit the Federal Power Commission from granting power licenses therein. This is no longer necessary. When the Federal Water Power Act was amended by the Federal Power Act in 1935, the definition of the reservations to which the act was to apply was amended to exclude national parks and monuments, thus removing these areas from the authority of the Federal Power Commission with respect to the issuance of power licenses, without regard to the date of their establishment. The intention of the Congress, by this amendment, to afford unlimited protection to all national parks and national monuments from encroachment of power development, is made undeniably clear by the legislative history. In the report (No. 1318, 74th Cong.) accompanying the bill, S. 2796, which became the Federal Power Act of 1935, it is stated (p. 22): "The definition of the former term (reservations) has been amended to exclude national parks and national monuments. Under an amendment to the act passed in 1921, the Commission has no authority to issue licenses in national parks or national monuments. The purpose of this change in the definition of reservations is to remove from the act all suggestion of authority for the granting of such licenses."

In an opinion by the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior, dated December 5, 1939, he held: "Any attempt to preserve this authority in the Commission by specific provision in the national monument proclamation would be ineffective since the authority of the Commission has been prescribed by Congress and cannot be extended by provisions in an Executive proclamation of this character."

It is true that the above-mentioned opinion of the Solicitor was not promulgated until almost a year and a half after the Dinosaur proclamation was issued. However, it is my understanding that the Department of the Interior has consistently taken the position, since the enactment of the amendatory Federal Power Act of 1935, that the Federal Power Commission is precluded, by the plain terms of that act, from exercising any authority whatever within the national parks and national monuments, and that no further legislative protection for these areas is necessary.

To the people of Utah and Colorado, friends of the national parks would say, by all means get your water and power. Your need is obvious, and you have every right to have that need fulfilled; but be careful you do not wipe out primary existing national values at the same time—values that, if preserved in the national monument, will provide a never-ending source of business to the neighboring communities. Insist that the Bureau explore alternate sites thoroughly for you. Above all, go into the monument. Visit Round Top, Pats Hole, Harper's Corner, explore some the Yampa, Split Mountain, and Lodore Canyons. Compare the area with other parks and monuments, and know what is at stake.

Dinosaur National Monument, in the writer's opinion, is second to no other area of the national park and monument system in its magnificence of scenic grandeur; and its unique scenery is duplicated nowhere else in the system. If the two dams are not built, I would recommend that the area be redesignated a national park and given a name like Green and Yampa Canyons National Park or Lodore National Park. I am convinced the area will become one of our most famous wilderness reservations; and when visitor access and accommodations are provided, will prove a lasting gold mine to northern Utah and Colorado. People in the local communities are in a strong position, acting through their representatives in Congress, to see that the Park Service receives the necessary appropriation to open the area to visitor use; and the local communities should be assisted by the friends of national parks from coast to coast to see that this is done.

Chinese Communist Intervention in Korea

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT A. TAFT

OF OHIO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, Foreign Secretary of the Philippines, on Chinese Communist intervention in Korea, delivered on December 7, 1950, in the First Committee of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY GEN. CARLOS P. ROMULO, FOREIGN SECRETARY OF THE PHILIPPINES, ON CHINESE INTERVENTION IN KOREA, IN THE FIRST COMMITTEE, DECEMBER 7, 1950

Last October, the General Assembly reaffirmed the wisdom and necessity of the action which the Security Council had taken in June condemning the North Korean regime for its act of aggression against the Republic of Korea. Today, in the same area, we are confronted with armed intervention by Communist Chinese troops against the forces of the United Nations.

The author of this intervention being the regime that now controls the Chinese mainland, it is clear that we are faced with no ordinary armed conflict such as the United Nations has dealt with at one time or another during the past 4 years. This armed intervention is directed not against one country alone but against the United Nations. From the very nature, therefore, of the two sides involved in the hostilities, it is plain that we are dealing with a situation that carries with it the stark menace of total war.

Not since the Berlin crisis of 1948 has mankind stood so close to the brink of war. Therefore I feel certain that the General Assembly will bring to the discussion of this problem a deep sense of the mortal danger which mankind runs unless the United Nations acts speedily and calmly to avert it.

Speaking as I do here for a country that is closer than most to the scene of hostilities, I may perhaps be permitted to state that I bring to this discussion more than our share of this deep awareness of danger. Yet, of course, the danger is common to us all, and if we fail to allay it at the source, it can spread so rapidly in every direction that there shall be neither here nor there, no place beyond reach of the fire that shall consume us all.

Yet, even in this hour of crisis, it behooves us to consider very calmly the facts that have given rise to the crisis and on which we must base our judgment. The facts relative to the act of aggression by the North Korean troops against the Republic of Korea were presented and argued in the General Assembly earlier during the present session. The discussion resulted in the approval by the Assembly of a resolution condemning the North Korean regime for its act of aggression against the Republic of Korea and approving measures for the unification and rehabilitation of the country. In pursuance of this resolution, a relief and rehabilitation program was set up and United Nations forces crossed the thirty-eighth parallel in pursuit of the North Korean forces in order to effect the territorial and political unification of the country.

At the same time, the United Nations and its military commander in the field gave the most solemn assurances that the United Nations forces would respect the integrity of the Manchurian frontier and fully recognize the rights and interests of China in the region. Proof of the genuineness of these assurances was dramatically given by the United Nations forces which, upon reaching the Changjin Reserve near the frontier, not only stopped there but refrained from doing anything to interrupt the flow of power to Manchuria. Even if the Peiping regime had reason in the beginning to doubt the sincerity of the assurances that were given, the conduct of the United Nations forces in an area where the rights and interests of China were directly exposed to possible interference should have convinced that regime that we are determined to abide by our commitments.

Therefore, the Assembly must note the highly significant fact that the United Nations forces in Korea not only did not offer any provocation to the Peiping government, but went out of their way to prove by their conduct that the assurances of nonintervention would be faithfully observed.

Despite these assurances and the action of our troops in proof of their sincerity, hundreds of thousands of Chinese Communist troops crossed the frontier to fight the armies of the United Nations in Korea.

The General Assembly is now called upon to pass judgment upon these plain and indisputable facts. No case could be clearer. The military developments in North Korea resulting from the continuous flow of Communist Chinese troops across the frontier and their active participation in the conflict have become so grave that the denial of the charge of armed intervention can only be described as a hollow and cynical mockery. The attempt to camouflage these troops as volunteers must be regarded as part of an elaborate fiction which, I am sure, the Peiping government itself does not expect us to believe.

Indeed, the vehemence with which the Peiping representative has defended and praised the action of these volunteers thoroughly betrays the real character of these troops. For it is normal practice for governments to disclaim all knowledge of and responsibility for the acts of its nationals who volunteer for service with a foreign army, and some go so far as to deprive such persons of their citizenship. The Peiping government has rejected such precautions and finds it wholly unnecessary to keep up any pretense whatever. Well-organized, battle-hardened, and well equipped, "Red" Chinese Communist troops are evidently part of the regular army sent across the border on an errand of intervention in Korea.

The excuse that Peiping has given is that the Chinese Communist troops are helping the Koreans to rid the country of "American imperialist domination." This accusation has been made not once but many times in this Assembly in the loud and vehement accents of Russian propaganda. For it has become a familiar tactic of Soviet propaganda to accuse the other powers of the crime of imperialism, thinking thus to conceal from us the real menace which confronts the world—the terrifying menace of Soviet imperialism—this restless, resolute and unquenchable thirst for domination of the world that is without parallel in history.

I say, sir, that you can make this false accusation against so-called American imperialism in Russian, but you cannot say it in Chinese.

You cannot say it in Chinese unless you are speaking in translation from Russian. You cannot say it in Chinese because no Chinese who knows the history of his country and who is aware of the long historic friendship between the Chinese people and the American people can make this accusation without sounding as if he were faithfully parroting the stale phrases of Russian propaganda.

This country, which has never been at war with China, which was the one great power that took no part in the spoilation of China, which has consistently championed the cause of the Chinese people against their traditional enemies—the Japanese, the Russians—which has generously given help to the Chinese people in adversity, I say, sir, that this great country, with such a record, can face the representative of the Peiping regime and shame him into silence.

Nobody claims that the United States of America has been guiltless of imperialism. Having expanded from ocean to ocean in the space of a hundred years and achieved enormous wealth and power in its own right, this country was not immune to the temptations of the era of imperialist expansion that coincided with its growth as a power of consequence in the world. But she was a latecomer in the field. She lacked the natural drive and experience for major undertakings of this type outside her own continental borders. Above all, the inherent idealism of the American people rooted deep in the revolutionary beginnings of their own nation disqualified them from playing the imperialist game with skill and singleness of purpose. They were soon to discover that imperialist adventures were not in the true American tradition.

One such adventure brought America to the Philippines toward the end of the last century. Thus began a relationship lasting four decades that never quite fitted into the classical pattern of imperialism. Instead of oppressing the people, they taught them to cherish freedom. Instead of ruling the country with an iron hand, they trained the people in the art of self-government. Instead of keeping the people in ignorance the better to keep them docile and ignorant, they built schools, libraries, colleges and a state university. Instead of destroying their national consciousness, they developed the people's pride in their own history and traditions. And as for profits, it is a matter of record that America never did make money in the Philippines. Even the American troops that were stationed there never lived off the land or the taxes of the people; they were paid out of the United States Treasury.

As early as 1916, the United States Congress enacted an organic act for the Philippines and gave a pledge to recognize its independence as soon as a stable government would be established. Such a promise on the part of a colonial power was unprecedented at that time, and it is still far from fashionable today. In 1935, the United States passed another law providing for the drawing up of a constitution by the representatives of the people and for the recognition of Philippine independence on July 4, 1946.

The war in the Pacific which occurred at the middle of the transition period provided the severest possible test for the relations between the American and the Filipino peoples. Almost alone among the dependent territories in Asia, the Philippines stood loyally beside the administering power—proof of the wisdom and foresight of American policy.

In 1946, even as my country lay prostrate as a result of the war's devastation, the United States fulfilled its pledge to the letter and recognized the independence of the Philippines. This was done at the peak of American glory and power, at the moment of supreme triumph, when a move to withdraw its pledge and to postpone independence would have been understandable in view of the complete disorganization of the Philippine economy. That would have been excuse enough to conceal any American designs in Asia in the advancement of which the Philippines would have proved immensely useful. Such a move would not have been difficult to justify because at that time the United States had agreed to recognize the territorial claims of the Soviet Union on southern Sakhalin and the Kurile islands as well as its economic interests in the port of Dairen, the Chinese Eastern Railroad and the South Manchurian Railroad as the price of Soviet Russian participation in the war against Japan. Such considerations, however, did not deter the United States from fulfilling its solemn pledge. At the very moment that the Soviet Union was staking its claim at the expense of the Chinese people and was stripping Manchuria of its extensive industrial apparatus, the United States was giving generously of its substance to relieve the sufferings of the war-devastated countries, including China and the Philippines, and was getting ready to set the Philippines free and to implement a program for its economic rehabilitation.

I have dwelt at some length on the contrasting conduct of the United States and the Soviet Union in the same region and at the same point of time because I believe that this is the most effective way to refute the charges of so-called American imperialism in Asia.

I believe that, in the long run, the meaning of this contrast has not been lost to the peoples of Asia, including the great bulk of the Chinese people for whom, in these days of temporary estrangement, we have the strongest feelings of sympathy and respect. It will not be lost to the peoples of Asia who have seen the United States lend the support of its influence and power to achieve the independence of Indonesia, while the Soviet Union stood on the sidelines unwilling to lift a finger to help because she could not make political capital out of a peaceful settlement of the problem.

The resources of the United States have been poured out by the billions of dollars since the war to succor the needy of all nations, to provide assistance to underdeveloped countries, to strengthen the economy of the postwar world. Against this record of so-called imperialist America, we are obliged to set in contrast the nonparticipation of the Soviet Union in similar activities and its total abstention from all forms of international cooperation in promoting the economic, social, and cultural progress of the world.

By setting the Philippines free, the United States inaugurated a series of acts of colonial emancipation in Asia that has included the independence of India, Pakistan, Burma, Ceylon, and Indonesia. We are convinced that this process will continue until the last colony is free. Again, we are obliged to set against this record the record of the Soviet Union—this power which, as a result of the last war for freedom, has swallowed up the three Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania, and Esthonia, and has clamped the most oppressive chains upon nearly all the states on its eastern frontier. Is the world supposed to learn no further lesson from this contrast: That the United States enjoys the most amicable relations with all its neighbors in North and South America, while the Soviet Union is feared and suspected by its neighbors in the Far East, South Asia, and Europe?

In the face of these historical facts and facts of record, we do not believe that the peoples of Asia, and in particular, the Chinese people, will remain deceived for a long time regarding the motives and policies of the United States and the Soviet Union. We understand fully well that today the Chinese people are not free, that access to the facts has been barred to them by the machinations of vicious and lying propaganda.

Nevertheless, the peoples of the free world must continue to act on the assumption that it is not impossible to hope for a measure of understanding with the Chinese people even at this late hour, to persuade them that their own best interests, though surely not the selfish interests of the Soviet Union, would be served by an attempt to consider with us the possibility of negotiations that might lead to the cessation of conflict in Korea.

The Chinese people are not our enemy. I say this on behalf of a neighboring country that has had relations of friendship with China for hundreds of years. It was in this spirit that my country joined 12 other countries of Asia in an appeal to the Peiping government 2 days ago.

Mr. Chairman, we have now before us a six-power resolution in virtually the same terms in which it was presented to the Security Council. I recognize that its submission to us in this precise form is justified and even necessitated by the nature of its origin and the procedure under which the question has come before the General Assembly. My government concurs substantially in this proposal. Due regard for the necessity of exhausting every source of peaceful negotiation in order to avert the danger of a third world war must be constantly kept in mind.

I wish to reserve the right to speak again at a later stage of the debate should the circumstances warrant such further intervention.

Japan Forced To Play Passive Role

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ZALES N. ECTON
OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. ECTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Japan Forced To Play Passive Role," published in the Washington Sunday Star of December 17, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAPAN FORCED TO PLAY PASSIVE ROLE

(By Sebastian Haffner)

LONDON.—Surely the oddest thing about the Korean crisis is that the one great power which, apart from China, is most vitally concerned by what happens in Korea plays no part in it at all. That is Japan.

It seems difficult to realize today that up to 5 years ago Korea was firmly and unquestionably in Japanese hands, and that for 15 years, from 1930 to 1945, it has been the basis from which Japanese power had ranged all over Manchuria and North China. No doubt this was an overextension of Japanese power which was bound to be corrected. But a Japanese interest in Korea is, nevertheless, perfectly legitimate, and Japanese concern about Korea is, indeed, inevitable as long as Japan is in any way capable of taking normal care of her own safety and vital interests. Korea in the hands of any other great power is, in a trite but perfectly exact phrase, a pistol pointed at Japan's heart. The least that Japan, if she were master of her own destiny, would be bound to insist on with all her power would be that Korea remained an independent buffer state between herself, China, and the Soviet Far East.

Now, of course, Japan is not at present master of her own destiny, and so profoundly is she conscious of this that she does not even care to take notice of what is happening on her doorstep. With the Chinese flood rolling toward her, she remains as numb as an anesthetized body.

This is not because Japan's physical power has disappeared. Her 90,000,000 people are all there, and they have not lost their political and national cohesion, their technical skills, or their formidable fighting qualities, which only recently terrified the world. There is not the slightest doubt that Japan remains intrinsically one of the great powers of the present day—probably still a considerably greater power than China. Nor is there any doubt that if this power were operative in a normal way, nobody would have to worry about China overrunning Korea.

But Japan's power is, momentarily, self-effacing and withholding itself, in literal obedience to the dictates of her recent conquerors. If Japan wanted to exact a subtle revenge on these conquerors, and to prove the self-defeating absurdity of the short-sighted policy of unconditional surrender, total disarmament and total political emasculation, which they have pursued toward her during the past 5 years, she could choose no more effective method than her present attitude.

UNITED STATES PAYS PENALTY

For it is now proven that American long-range power cannot replace Japanese local power in the Far East and the complete elimination of Japan from the far eastern power constellation has exposed America and her allies to the present humiliation at the hands of China. China is, of course, a smaller power than the United States on any abstract reckoning, but locally she is, as we now see, quite capable of successfully defying the United States, whose centers of strength are 7,000 miles away, and who, moreover, has other areas in the world to take care of. China would not be able to do this if she were locally checked by an independent and armed, albeit defeated and chastened, Japan, who would be inevitably driven by her own vital interests to impose such a check on her. America is now paying the penalty for having, temporarily, deprived Japan of her independence and paralyzed her vital nerve; instead of holding the balance of power between China and Japan, of which she would be perfectly capable, she has to fight China practically single-handed, and at long range a task which overtaxes even her vast power potential.

What is true of Japan in Asia is equally true of Germany in Europe. There is no doubt that German power in the thirties and early forties had become exorbitant and had to be curbed. There is equally no longer any doubt that the western powers with their "unconditional surrender" policy and their treatment of defeated Germany fatally overshot the mark and put Europe at the mercy of Russia. They are now awkwardly and belatedly trying to retrace their steps. But even now they labor under the delusion that they can treat Germany simultaneously as an ally and as a defeated enemy, and that they can have an effective military "contribution to western defense" from a politically humiliated and emasculated nation. They are unlikely to make much progress before they free themselves from this schizophrenia.

The present crisis, of which Korea is the most conspicuous, but by no means the most menacing, part, is the nemesis of "unconditional surrender," and of all that followed. By enforcing the unconditional surrender and the total disarmament of Japan and Germany, the victors of 1945 knocked away two essential pillars of the balance of power in Europe and Asia. But only a balance of power provides a basis of peace in a world in which power is divided among independent nations. The world is today paying a heavy price for having forgotten this elementary truth. It will not find peace before it relearns it.

Dean Acheson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "These Days," written by George Sokolsky and published in the Washington Times-Herald of December 21, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THESE DAYS

(By George Sokolsky)

The Republicans have petitioned the President to redress a great grievance against the United States by dismissing Dean Acheson as Secretary of State. The petition will, for the moment, be ignored.

Democrats and others suggest that this is no time to complain about Dean Acheson. They propose that we shall have unity.

If by unity, they mean that no public official is to be criticized even if the blood of our sons is spilled because of his stiff-necked obstinacy and his lack of good sense, then they ask not for unity but for abject acceptance of stupidity as a rule of life.

It would seem that logic would require, if unity is to be achieved, that one who has become so unpalatable to the American people as Dean Acheson is, be retired. Who is this man that unity must depend upon his continuance in office?

Suppose by the laws of nature, Dean Acheson would drop dead, would the United States cease to exist? If it is unity that is required and this man is an impediment to unity, does Mr. Truman mean to tell us that even among deserving Democrats there is not one man who is capable of being Secretary of State, of inspiring confidence and of achieving unity?

If the President were to accept a national rather than a partisan criterion, the number is very large. This Nation is not so bankrupt in personalities that it is limited to one man, to any one man.

Therefore, the plea that opposition to Dean Acheson imperils unity is nonsense. It is Dean Acheson who imperils unity.

His policy in China has proved to be a failure for which we are paying with the lives of our children. His policy in Europe has brought us only associates but no allies. His policy in South America has weakened our ties with our most important neighbors.

He has appeased Soviet Russia until that country has become the mightiest on earth, lessening our influence by a war in which we have been defeated. He has only enriched Great Britain at our expense.

Surely, it is not Dean Acheson, but the United States of America that is important.

In 1943, the United States was a tremendous force in the world, courted by all nations. We were feeding a large part of the world; we were supplying warring nations. We were giving away about $50,000,000,000.

We were giving to Russia $11,000,000,000. We were fighting on a dozen fronts. In Asia, we were fighting nearly alone with Nationalist China as our principal ally. In Europe, our troops were carrying the burden into Germany.

In November, two conferences were held, one at Cairo and one at Tehran, and from December 1, 1943, until today our power in the world has been receding. At Moscow, Tehran, Dumbarton Oaks, Yalta, San Francisco, London, and Paris the United States was talked out of influence, power, and authority.

And all the time the American taxpayer was paying for his own destruction. And it culminated in the retreat from Korea and the miserable monkeys insulting our country in daily speeches on our own soil at the United Nations, and they are entitled to do it by treaty. We have come to that.

Now, I do not say that Dean Acheson is responsible for all that. Such an assumption is wholly false. He is not a big enough man to have done so much damage.

But he is also not a big enough man to have arrested the decay of policy, to have strengthened our moral position, or to have inspired confidence in the people.

Acheson has become a symbol of decay. The American people responded to the symbol that Acheson has become when he spoke on television and radio and chilled his countrymen. It was not the words, nor his immaculate dress, nor his lack of oratory. It was an atmosphere.

The terrifying fact that faces this country is that in this war we are led by many of the same personalities who since November 1943 have been the authors of our failures. What unity can there be in that?

Statement by the Committee on the Present Danger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, this morning I received a communication from Dr. Vannevar Bush, a member of the Committee on the Present Danger, which apparently is comprised of a very distinguished group of educators and lawyers. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD their very fine statement, in my opinion, of the present situation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A STATEMENT BY THE COMMITTEE ON THE PRESENT DANGER

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 12, 1950.

The acts of naked aggression by powerful Communist forces in the Far East constitute a grave threat to the survival of the United Nations, and a peril to the very security of these United States, which cannot be mistaken, cannot be ignored.

The members of the Committee on the Present Danger, making this statement, believe that the hour is at hand when our country must mobilize its manpower and resources on a scale great enough to meet the real and present danger, and that scale is very great indeed.

We confront the actuality of the assault by vast Red Chinese armies on the United Nations forces in Korea. We confront the condition of military weakness in Western Europe, a condition seriously worsened by recent shocking developments in the Far East. We confront the fact that in these circumstances American power is far from adequately mobilized. We confront the fact that we can find no safety by withdrawal from overseas and by attempting to make the North American Continent impregnable—that would be a counsel of despair and defeat.

Even in this crisis we totally reject the idea of a preventive war. Nor do we accept the idea that war with the Soviet Union is inevitable—unless the Soviet so wills it. On the contrary, we believe that the great objectives of our foreign policy and military policy—working in common with the other free countries in the United Nations—should continue to be the attainment of an enduring peace, looking toward a condition in which the beginnings of world disarmament may be made. But we are convinced that there is no hope of accomplishing these objectives so long as the military position of the free countries remains as weak as it is today.

The aggressive designs of the Soviet Union are unmistakably plain. Its Asiatic ally and satellite has launched an all-out attack upon the United Nations forces in Korea. In Western Europe the ability of the United States Air Force to inflict heavy damage on Russia's strategic centers has been the chief deterrent to a full-scale Communist attack. Radical improvements in defense against air attack, together with growing ability of the Soviet Union to produce atomic bombs, is progressively weakening the effectiveness of this restraint. Unless an adequate supplement for the atomic potential of the United States is brought into existence, the time may soon come when all of continental Europe can be forced into the Communist fold, and the British Isles placed again in even graver peril than in 1940, at sacrifices in blood and wealth that the Kremlin would accept. No scruples of conscience will stand in their way.

In our view, the necessary supplement to our present atomic leadership is an allied force in being strong enough to furnish effective resistance to military aggression. Such a force in readiness to execute the decisions of the free countries assembled in the United Nations would make those decisions respected. That force does not exist. To meet the need, it must be promptly built. To create it the United States must take the leadership. The European nations will make the greater effort required only if the United States takes a firm stand beside them, provides the balance of the equipment needed, and, most important of all, makes a powerful contribution of troops.

Our part will call for greater sacrifices than any our people have yet been prepared for. Since our contribution will include forces in Europe and in the Far East, as well as a strategic reserve in this country, the total program will of necessity be a large one, calling, we believe, for a total United States armed force of at least 3,500,000 men.

Also, the danger of an all-out war is so serious that all of our young men must have military training. But universal military training alone is no longer an adequate solution of the problems which now face us because it does not provide a force in being.

The time has come for a new concept that universal service in defense of our freedom is a privilege and an obligation of our young men. To accomplish this with the least interference with education, with business and professional careers, and with family life, this service should commence at the age of 18 or upon graduation from high school, whichever is later. Two years of such military service, including training, will be necessary, and the program should embrace radically broadened standards of fitness.

We recognize that many detailed provisions interpreting and applying these principles remain to be worked out, and we expect shortly to present concrete proposals.

The above program would, of course, be a supplement to the selective-service law, not a substitute for it.

But in addition to providing military manpower, this country must expand the program for equipment and supplies far beyond goals already announced. This will be a hard task, calling for development of the strongest possible organization to supervise our military procurement here and abroad. It will require submission to economic controls more exacting that those now in effect, particularly in the field of credit, Government and private. It will also render necessary a sharp reduction in Government spending for nondefense purposes.

The doubt is not whether such a program is too arduous. The doubt is whether it is arduous enough. Certainly it is not nearly as drastic as the conditions which make it necessary. The price is high, but we believe it must be paid. It is, in our judgment, the only chance of averting a war of world dimensions, or of assuring victory if, in spite of all our efforts to maintain the peace, the Soviet Union insists upon precipitating world war III. We shall at the least have created strength which may convince the 14 men in the Kremlin that further aggression will not pay.

The Committee on the Present Danger has been formed in the American tradition by civilians acting on a nonpartisan basis. It will enlarge its membership and strive to further the above purposes. To this end we are already studying certain specific problems, and will from time to time make reports to the public dealing with them.

The bitter fact is that our country has again been thrust into a struggle in which our free existence is at stake, a struggle for survival. We have no time to lose.

Reorganization of the Executive Branch of the Federal Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. WILLIAMS OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial dealing with the reorganization of the executive branch of the Federal Government, which appeared in the Wilmington Morning News yesterday morning.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WE NEED IT MORE THAN EVER

Credit the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report with a timely reminder. The job of reorganizing the executive branch of the Federal Government, says the committee in its latest summary, is about half done—and this should mean an eventual saving of about $2,000,000,000. But it needs to be finished.

That is a timely reminder because some might think that it would be a mistake to push this renovation program at a time when the Government is trying to meet a national emergency. The truth of the matter is that the need for efficient governmental machinery is all the greater now "to withstand the shock and strain of continuous economic and military attack."

It would have been better, of course, if the whole undertaking had been wrapped up long before this. Tinkering with the apparatus of Government just when it must take on heavier burdens is not to be recommended as a general practice. But when the apparatus has been demonstrated to be faulty as well as extravagant it is only sensible to strengthen it before it breaks down entirely.

Certainly it is absolutely imperative to reduce the cost of Government to a minimum at a time when defense outlay will raise Federal spending to near-wartime levels. Every dollar saved will not be another dollar for arms—whatever must be appropriated for that purpose will be forthcoming. But it will be a dollar that will not add to inflationary pressure, and runaway inflation could bring a disaster almost as terrible as military defeat.

The hard part of the reorganization program is still ahead. Dr. Robert L. Johnson, chairman of the citizens committee, thinks that the 50 percent still to be done will be "far more difficult" to accomplish than the first half. But he ought to be wrong. For the need has been made sharper than ever.

Anatomy of the PAC

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH W. GWINN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. GWINN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article which appeared in the November 27, 1950, issue of the Freeman by Edna Lonigan:

ANATOMY OF THE PAC
(By Edna Lonigan)

There is obviously something very wrong in Washington that our usual explanations do not cover. The Truman administration spent $214,000,000,000 from July 1945 to July 1950, but we have neither peace nor plenty. We have no military force and no foreign policy adequate to meet the dangers we face. A growing popular awareness of these facts was an important factor in the administration's defeats on Election Day.

All political action has its roots in the sources of political power. Every act in Washington is explainable by what is happening in the election districts. It is changes in the election districts, and in our party system, over the last 18 years, which have made possible the strange new policies of our Federal Government.

In early 1940 the inner stresses within the Democratic Party grew too great, and the party split. Farley, Hull, and Garner were opposed to the third term because, as Farley said, in America new men should be allowed to come up from below. The New Dealers favored a third term because, if Roosevelt retired, they would have nowhere to go. They had little standing or achievements in private life. The New Dealers won; but the bureaucrats, who had not come up through the ranks, could not hold political power. They only precipitated a struggle within the ranks of the "ins" to determine who was going to be the party.

Beneath the old party labels, who is exercising the power now? Obviously the party machine or fraction is much stronger, more stable and more skillful than the New Dealers ever were. This new political machine, which holds together the fragments that make up the Fair Deal and rules the old Democratic Party, is an outgrowth of the CIO's Political Action Committee (PAC).

The PAC was formally organized on July 7, 1943, by the executive board of the CIO, under the guidance of Sidney Hillman. Its purpose, according to CIO President Philip Murray, was to "mobilize the 5,000,000 members of the CIO * * * for effective labor action on the political front." He explained that because of the "deplorable record of the Seventy-eighth Congress, the primary political task today is to weld the unity of all workers, farmers and other progressives, behind candidates, regardless of party affiliations, who support the war program of our Commander in Chief, and enlightened domestic and foreign policies." From the beginning the PAC was vitally interested in the composition of Congress, and in control of policy through control of Congress.

The PAC prgram was well under way in the summer of 1944. At the Chicago convention where PAC helped to nominate him for a fourth term, President Roosevelt was quoted as saying: "Clear everything with Sidney." The PAC supported Truman for Vice President and probable successor, and helped elect a Congress which would carry out the Roosevelt policies.

The new Seventy-ninth Congress followed the Roosevelt-PAC line in foreign affairs, with UNO, UNRRA, Bretton Woods; but on domestic policy it refused to go along with the demands of the PAC spokesmen to keep peacetime price controls and to make deficit financing permanent by voting public housing, socialized medicine and other welfare schemes.

In the 1946 campaign, the PAC arrogantly demanded that the voters defeat all the candidates for Congress who had refused to support its measures and had dared to advocate a free economy. It was roundly defeated by the voters, who were sick of rationing.

After the 1946 campaign the PAC dropped out of sight. Most people thought it was no longer dangerous. What has the PAC been doing since 1946?

Under PAC the local CIO officials became grass-roots political organizers responsible for seeing that every union member and his family were registered and educated to vote for policies the PAC favored. The machinery of the unions was converted to supply trained organizers, and followers drilled in obedience. PAC also supplied a means of political compulsion on the voters because, under the Wagner Act, workers who refused to register on the orders of the shop steward could be deprived of their jobs and their union cards, that is, of their right to work in any other shop in the industry. Under the same threat the workers could also be compelled to make political contributions to the PAC fund. The unions, that is, exercised the power of taxation.

Policy was made at the top and ratified by the locals. There was no place for debate or dissenting opinion, and no way for change to come from below. There was no chance for the members to leave and form an opposition party, because they were tied to the PAC by their jobs. This amounted to virtual disfranchisement of the minority—or perhaps the majority—which did not agree with the policies made at national headquarters.

This new political machine differed from traditional American party organization in several important ways.

Our political system rests on what we call representative government, but the name, as usual, explains only the past significance of the idea. What does "representative" mean; representative of what? A representative political system is one in which local differences are represented, or preserved. Small areas have a spokesman at the seat of government, and, therefore, even if they differ from the most powerful or the most numerous, they cannot be obliterated by a ruling class at the center with its restless drive toward uniformity. Representative government is unity in diversity. It is the form of government which protects all the individual differences in a community because, as Mill put it so beautifully, those differences are precious to anyone who values humanity. It is, of course, the most mature and subtle of all patterns of political organization.

The representative principle is the complete antithesis of the leadership principle, in which one faction becomes supreme, and subordinates all other parts of the Nation to its will. The change from representative government to totalitarian government has its counterpart in the change in the political party, from the representative party reflecting the individual members with all their differences, to the leadership party. In the new party men are controlled in masses by a steering mechanism at the center, which induces them to vote alike, as the leaders wish, and replaces free choice with the plebiscite.

The PAC was then by its very formation a challenge to representative government. Workingmen who could be seduced by promises of social gains into accepting a package of ideas bound together at the center, or compelled to accept them through fear of losing their jobs, were no longer free citizens of a republic.

All this power might not have been so dangerous, except that the new political bosses knew exactly how to use it. Joseph Gaer, official historian of the PAC, tells us in The First Round, that in 1942, out of 80,000,000 voters, only 28,000,000 cast their votes. The PAC leaders knew, as Insull knew, that most voters, whether at the polls or at directors' meetings, are inert. Whoever controls a very small fraction of the votes can control the whole body. With only 28,000,000 citizens voting, an organization which could bring one or two million strategically distributed new voters to the polls could control the whole United States.

Hillman knew that the primaries were even more important than the vote on election day because an outside faction could more easily get control and put its men in, or prevent its opponents from being nominated, so that the voters could not choose them if they wanted to.

Another trifle was noticed by Hillman and his legal staff. The Corrupt Practices Act and the Smith-Connally Act, which governed contributions to political parties by unions or corporation, did not apply to the primaries. The PAC could spend all the money it liked in the primaries, and still be within the law.

With this new weapon Sidney Hillman and his coworkers set to work to turn the flank of the Democratic Party, by defeating every vestige of the Farley-Garner wing and building up a new group of candidates committed to PAC policies.

A Nation-wide political junta of left-wing union leaders able to put 12,000,000 votes and millions of dollars behind policies of their own choosing, and to force their opponents out of public life, would have been threat enough to representative government. But American labor had nothing to do with it.

In January 1944 Earl Browder reported to the American Communist Party that the Soviet leaders had decided to disband it, and replace it with a new political organization including workers, farmers, and other progressives, organized in every election district through the labor unions.

This new party conforms in every respect with the structure of the PAC, announced a few months earlier. What is even more interesting, the Communist Party announced its dissolution a few months later and became the Communist Political Association. The remarkable resemblance between the PAC and Browder's program for the Communist Party was spelled out by the Dies committee in March 1944 in House Report 1311. The Communist Party and its allies raised the usual bitter criticisms of this report, but they did not answer its facts.

Browder said the new policy was to achieve "national unity for the realization of the perspectives laid down in Tehran." These perspectives included Big Three unity, a postwar economic program for the United States resting on vast foreign loans (especially to Russia), "capital funds for the improvement of undeveloped countries," "full employment," and higher income for "consumers." The new party was not to attack capitalists, but actively to seek cooperation with all workers and farmers, and especially with businessmen, capitalists, and their managers. This power was to be directed to liquidation of fascism in Germany and Japan and of the "reactionary and pro-Fascist circles in the United States." Every single element in the Browder program was incorporated in the PAC program. It has been the policy of the administration ever since.

In 1944 PAC enjoyed a sweeping victory in the fourth-term election of President Roosevelt and of their candidate for Vice President, Harry Truman. They salved Wallace's wounds by demanding that he be appointed Secretary of Commerce, a move that gagged even Roosevelt. Roosevelt died soon afterward. PAC's man was President, and Wallace was close to the President's ear, where he could make his suggestions on foreign and domestic policy.

The most important PAC victory, however, was in Congress. Joseph Gaer lists 12 Members of Congress who were defeated in the 1944 elections with the fullest cooperation of the PAC. They were Dies, Starnes, and Costello, of the Dies committee; Kennedy, Kleberg, Lambertson, Newsome, and Patton, in the House; and Worth Clark, Champ Clark, Rufus Holman, and Ellison Smith, in the Senate.

Another outstanding triumph of PAC in 1944 was obtained in the primaries, particularly in the Southern States, where the small number of voters participating made it especially easy for the PAC techniques to win control. In fact we shall never know the extent of the power exercised by the PAC until we have had a full study of the primary contests, especially in the Southern States.

We know the results in part by the slow but unremitting rise in the number of liberal southerners who have come to Washington to represent the Democratic Party. It is extremely difficult to persuade the southerners that the PAC has so much weight. They know "It can't happen here." They do not yet see what can happen when the power released by WPA, farm payments, NLRB, and the unions falls into the hands of a small group with a military sense of strategy and perfect military synchronization.

What became of the PAC after the Eightieth Republican Congress came in? We can be sure, knowing the forces in control of the PAC, that it went somewhere. The Communists never retreat; they only change tactics. They merely turned off their propaganda. That is a technique the New Dealers knew well. Whenever the comment grows unfavorable enough, just drop out of sight, and people will forget.

Evidence of how far the PAC idea had become embedded in the regular Democratic Party is furnished in a speech by Francis L. McElroy, New York State Democratic campaign manager in 1946. Mr. McElroy declared that the Republican Party in New York State was the rallying point in this country for pro-Hitler forces. "The arguments employed in this campaign by Mr. Dewey * * * are the same deadly, vicious arguments which Hitler and the Nazis used to gain power in Germany," he said.

Mr. McElroy added that the Democratic Party was ready to back its charge that the Republican Party was the rallying point for every un-American organization, every bigot, every treasonable person in the Nation.

That is not the language of the American party system. If you test it by the use of symbols, it is the language of the Browder program of 1944. Because the PAC was so perfectly camouflaged as a labor movement, it was able to win over large strata of the American middle classes—the teachers, religious leaders, skilled workers.

In 1947 various State conventions of the CIO ratified (unanimously) the PAC program in preparation for 1948. So, curiously enough, did various State conventions of the AFL.

What united them? The Taft-Hartley Act. Is that because Taft-Hartley hurt the working people or because it hurt some one else? The act forbade unions to punish their members by loss of their union cards (their right to work in most trades) for any reason except nonpayment of dues. Workers could not be legally punished for refusing to vote as ordered, or for refusing to contribute to a political cause. This put a crimp in the PAC.

The Wagner Act had evidently been drafted with Communist help. Charles Kramer, a friend of Lee Pressman, was in Wagner's office. Lee Pressman, former CIO general counsel, has admitted his Communist connections. Nathan Witt, secretary of the NLRB, was listed as belonging to the same cell. Taft-Hartley put an end to the use of the unions as a political chain gang, under American Government auspices. Except for one thing.

Though Taft-Hartley injured the Communists, it certainly did not injure the workers. Why then did the workers unite against it? Because the Communists executed another strategic retreat. They let go of the prominent offices in the CIO but they still had control of the press, and the policy-making and opinion-forming organs. Then they got their ideas into the opinion-forming agencies of the AFL, especially its League for Political Education.

How could the AFL be captured by the Communist policy makers? It had a great tradition, but in the face of CIO "gains," its leaders thought they had to "do something." And the Communists were ready and waiting to tell them what to do—policies nicely hidden behind the cloak of higher wages, more benefits, but still fitting perfectly the symbols laid down to guide policy making by Earl Browder in 1944.

Labor was now no longer divided. There was no national "Democratic" Party. Where was the resistance to PAC to come from?

In 1948 we did not hear much about PAC. We heard instead of the Progressive Party, which nominated Henry Wallace on a third-party ticket, generally admitted to be the party of the Communists. But was it?

There was a strong belief among the Communist leadership that a third party was a great mistake. Hillman had seen and pointed out the technical difficulties which had made it impossible for even Theodore Roosevelt to set up a third party. He had also shown how easy it was to take over one of the old parties.

What proof have we that the Politburo in Moscow wanted the election of Wallace? Wallace certainly did not poll the total Communist vote. For 8 years they had worked on getting control of a major party. Why give up the Truman party?

In 1948 the New Dealers deserted Truman because they thought his ship was sinking. That merely showed the profound political stupidity of the bureaucracy turned political strategists. The men in the jobs stayed with Truman because they had to. Truman went into the convention with all the Presidential powers—the bureaucracy, the spending powers, and the power of appointment. The local machines had to go with the strongest. When Senator HUMPHREY put through what was virtually the PAC platform in the Democratic convention, and Truman accepted it, he was on his way.

Practically every word of Truman's campaign came, again, from Browder's pattern of 1944, which is the policy of the PAC. Practically every word of his attack on the Eightieth Congress can be found earlier in the pages of the Daily Worker and the People's Daily World.

What then was the role of Wallace and the third party? It was the old Communist dialectic. By setting up Wallace as the left, the Communists could make Truman's platform and speeches look like the center.

The reason Truman and the remnants of the Democratic Party fell into the trap is that after the defeat of the Farley-Hull-Garner group, there wasn't anything there. It is often said that the city machines took over the party. But the city machines do not have a policy. They were simple reflections of whatever were the prevailing ideas, those most likely to win votes on a simple day-to-day basis. The broken fragments that made up the once great Democratic Party—the unhappy Southern Democrats, the office-holders, the city machines which were naturally anti-Communist, the vast hordes of recipients of Government checks, on farms, in schools, in the States, in welfare—could offer no resistance to a small but determined group who knew the laws of strategy in their bones, who knew what they wanted and how to get it, and who had a perfect camouflage.

Of course Truman does not know this. He is wrapped in his silken cocoon. Nothing unpleasant is ever brought to his attention, nothing at all that would remotely suggest that he is surrounded by Communists in sheep's clothing. The hard-headed Americans who still remain in his circle are probably hoping that they will be able to recapture him and the party, and defeat the PAC machine, as Hull, Jesse Jones, Morgenthau, and Walker vainly hoped they could win over the destroyers in Roosevelt's day.

It is no part of the PAC strategy to be content with victory over the Democratic Party. Their aim is one-party government. They turned the flank of the Democratic Party by building up a faction of their own, and waging unremitting war on the leaders of the constitutional group. They expect to destroy the Hoover wing of the Republican Party as they destroyed the Farley-Garner wing of the Democratic Party. Then they would take over the others through "me-too-ism," and victory would be theirs. They are already far along their way.

The Communists have a well-organized leadership party operating within the shell of the old Democratic Party, but directed in military fashion by their secret agents. They were badly defeated in the recent election in a few critical States. But if they are to be decisively defeated, believers in representative government must be prepared for a long struggle. (Already the PAC is talking about broadening its appeal to the voters.) Americans do not like to believe that their relations with Communists in this country come under the rules of war. The Politburo has reversed the great dictum of Clausewitz, that war is politics by another means. To the Communists, politics is war by another means. There is no possibility for Americans to deal with the fifth column in our political parties except by that heightening of attention, intelligence, and devotion that are necessary in war.

Christmas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement which I prepared dealing with the Christmas season.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON CHRISTMAS, 1950

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, within 72 hours we in this Nation will once again be celebrating the Christmas holiday. I feel that we would be remiss indeed if we here in the United States Senate failed to publicly reaffirm our faith in the great meaning of Christmas unto all the ages and unto all mankind.

The birth of the Master holds for all men the answer to all of the problems which we have faced, are facing and will face. The message "Glory to God in the Highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men," is still the greatest news which has ever come to mankind.

There is a danger that because we are so close to all of the individual legislative trees—the problem of civil defense, taxes, appropriations, armaments, controls—we may fail to see the forest. We may become so lost in material remedies that we may fail to perceive that the basic solution to mankind's problems must be a spiritual solution, a birth in all men of an awareness of their heritage as children of God.

I want to convey my warmest greetings of the yuletide to all my colleagues in the Senate, to their staffs, and other employees of this great and august body.

I pray that out of the Christmas holiday may come a rededication on all of our parts to the principles of the Wayshower. We are told that "with God, all things are possible," and we know that it is "in Him we live and move and have our being." With the recognition of those facts, we will indeed be adequate to the challenge of world peace.

We here on this continent bid a Merry Christmas to all the peoples of the world. We have good will for all men. We seek harm to no one. We pray and will strive for the day when on earth there will indeed by a just, firm, and lasting peace.

Boyhood Background of Hon. Hubert H. Humphrey, of Minnesota

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article dealing with the boyhood life of our distinguished colleague, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. The article was published in the November 9, 1950, issue of the Times-Record, of Doland, S. Dak.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DOLAND PEOPLE TELL OF SENATOR HUMPHREY'S BOYHOOD BACKGROUND

(By Mrs. W. H. Doty)

Just before election, when Minnesota's junior Senator, HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, swung into this territory for a series of political speeches, his Doland friends flocked to hear him and to shake his hand.

People of this community are especially interested in HUMPHREY because many of them knew him as a bright, energetic youngster who went darting about his father's Doland drug store or zooming around his paper route.

EARLY TRAINING HERE

His family moved to Doland from Wallace when he was a small boy, and all of his grade and high-school training was received in the Doland schools.

Whenever he bobs into political limelight, as he has many times in his rapid rise to prominence, people here get an I-knew-him-when gleam in their eyes and avidly lap up anything newspapers, magazines, or radios say of him. Regardless of their political leanings, they are pleased at favorable comments and at least mildly irritated at unflattering gibes.

SOME DISAGREE WITH HIM

Not all of HUMPHREY'S former fellow-townsmen see eye to eye with him on his pet policies. In fact, many disagree sharply and say he is far too radical. But in this small town where he lived from the time he could barely toddle until he finished high school, many are genuinely fond of him. They remember him as a fast-moving youngster with lots of ability, a cooperative attitude, and a friendly grin for everyone.

SUBJECT OF COFFEE-CUP CONFABS

The Senator's activities and utterances have prompted many a coffee-cup confab here. Seldom do these lunch-counter discussions end until his boyhood friends have attempted to explain his rapid rise to prominence. The reasons advanced range from "He just got the breaks," to "Well, Pinky always was a darn smart boy."

There may be some truth in both these explanations, but more thoughtful and possibly more accurate ones have come from those more intimately associated with the lad during his 16 years in Doland.

CLOSE FAMILY FRIEND

When Mrs. Don Wolverton, close friend and former neighbor of the Humphrey family, was asked what she considered the most important factor in his success, she gave the following explanation: "I think his parents deserve much of the credit. His father's driving ambition to get ahead and burning aspirations for his family must have made a real impression on the boy. But his mother, I believe, contributed just as much in a quieter, less commanding way. Her stubborn adherence to what she believed was right gave him some ideals he shouldn't outgrow—even in politics."

Before Doland's beloved country doctor, H. W. Sherwood, died in 1944, he noted that young HUMPHREY was "making his mark," and he contended that Hubert, like most other small-town youngsters, had a definite advantage over those of larger towns or cities.

"If a small-town kid has any talent at all, he gets a chance to develop it because it gets attention earlier and the competition isn't so keen," often declared the aged physician, accenting his words with several thumps of his knobby cane.

FATHER'S POLITICAL CRONY

"No one can rightfully say that 'Ubert succeeded just because 'e got the breaks," protested English-born Alfred Paine, former Doland postmaster. "By gosh, 'e made 'is breaks; 'Ubert went places because 'e was 'Ubert and 'e 'ad wot it takes," bristled the gray-haired friend of the family.

Mr. Paine and Hubert's father were political cronies way back in the twenties, before it was popular in this vicinity to be a Democrat.

PASTOR AND SCOUT LEADER

Rev. Albert Hartt, now of Rosholt but formerly pastor of the church HUMPHREY attended in Doland, is positive that the faculty of Doland High School figured prominently in his success.

"The training and inspiration that particular group of teachers managed to give the Doland youth were most unusual," he has declared many times. He can recall many incidents as leader of young HUMPHREY'S Boy Scout troop. However, Reverend Hartt has always felt that the gifted Hubert could have done much better with his talents than to go all-out for politics.

SUPERINTENDENT OF SCHOOLS

If you should ask Guy W. Cook of Hot Springs, superintendent of Doland schools at that time, how he accounts for HUMPHREY'S record, he would be sure to mention his speech training.

"Learning to speak convincingly as a high-school debater," he told your reporter this summer, "is right where he got his start. Of course," Cook added thoughtfully, "Hubert alway had a good mind, lots of ambition, and an unusual gift of gab."

CAREFULLY FACES AUDIENCE

When HUMPHREY was in the seventh grade, he played the title role in the operetta, Jack and the Beanstalk. His costume simulated the tight-fitting clothing of medieval peasantry, with colorful shoulder puffs and short, bloomerlike overpants.

The beanstalk was a pole with pegs for climbing, camouflaged by artificial foliage and large cloth beanpods. * * * HUBERT nimbly climbed the beanstalk, but as he hurried down at the end of the scene, he caught the seat of his bloomers on a peg. Result: Young HUMPHREY carefully faced the audience the rest of the evening and Ruth Sapp, the girl playing the part of Jack's mother got the giggles and almost wrecked the performance. Ruth is now the wife of Commander W. S. Johnson, U. S. N. They have recently returned home after spending a year and a half on Guam.

EXTRACURRICULAR ACTIVITIES

While Hubert was a student at Doland High School, he took part in all extra-curricular activities. Although he was a tall, skinny youngster, he was wiry and determined enough to do fairly well in athletics and brainy enough to be a straight "A" student, besides doing odd jobs around the drugstore and occasionally indulging in a little horseplay with his pals. He was valedictorian of his class.

PROMINENT SCHOOLMATES

HUMPHREY had several schoolmates who, though not as well known in South Dakota as he, are very successful in their fields. On the debating team with him were Julian Hartt, Methodist minister's son who is now professor of religion in the divinity school at Yale University, and Alvin Hahn, a prominent attorney at Monrovia, Calif. Another member of that debating group was Earl Hansen, a prosperous farmer near Doland.

There are those who say they would prefer Hansen's comparatively carefree life as a successful farmer and solid citizen of the community to the uneasy heights of a top-ranking politician.

Possibly there was some magic in the initial "H" for these four boys, HUMPHREY, Hartt, Hahn, and Hansen, made stiff competition for even the largest high schools of the State.

One bit of HUMPHREY lore tells of an oratorical contest judged by Carl Mundt, then an instructor in the normal school at Madison. The story goes that Alvin Hahn received first place and HUBERT HUMPHREY second. School notes are said to have reported that Mr. Mundt gave the boys valuable criticisms after the contest.

KEEPS UP DOLAND CONTACTS

The Senator's Doland acquaintances are pleased that he takes time out to maintain his local contacts. His former Sunday school teacher, Edna Holmes, now town librarian, prizes the birthday remembrance he sends each year. Nor does he forget Mrs. Patience Wilkins, who says she used to boss him around just as she did her own children.

"When Hubert joined the gang in our yard, there was always plenty of activity," recalled Mrs. Wilkins. "He was a born leader even then. He seemed to be able to get them all to do what he wanted them to and still keep them happy."

No visit to Doland would be complete for HUBERT until he had gone into a huddle with Deschler Welch, a former classmate and probable partner in several pranks that gave their teachers a few gray hairs.

Doland people will continue to watch HUBERT HUMPHREY with interest and pride. At least a few wish he would be a bit more cautious in his upward climb because, in Doland, even Republicans hope he won't stub his political toe.

War and Inflation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY
OF WYOMING

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD the text of some remarks on war and inflation which I have prepared for delivery this evening over the NBC radio network.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR AND INFLATION

War is the consummate folly to which mankind has been condemned throughout all written history. It is the scourge of humanity, and leaves only a widening path of terror and destruction in its wake.

As science advances, war becomes more appalling, more all-inclusive, more utterly destructive. World War II far exceeded World War I in the devastation it wrought, and if there should be a third world war, it will drench the globe in a blood bath the horror of which no mind can conceive, save only that everyone who comprehends the devastating extent of the two global conflicts already fought in this generation must know that the sufferings and the burden of a third world war will be borne by generations yet unborn.

It was the comprehension of this fact that led the Government of the United States, even before military victory was achieved over Germany and Japan in 1945, to undertake the establishment of the United Nations. Our national purpose could not have been better stated than it was by Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, of Michigan, on the floor of the Senate on January 10, 1945, when he said, "We are fighting to defend America We still propose to help create the postwar world on a basis which will stop aggression for keeps and, so far as humanly possible, substitute justice for force among free men. We propose to do it primarily for our own sake. We still propose also to substitute justice for force—if we can—in writing the peace which terminates this war."

In that memorable speech which laid the cornerstone of what has been called the bipartisan international policy, Senator VANDENBERG also proposed unity of military action among the United Nations for the purpose of suppressing aggression. "It must mean one for all and all for one," he said, "and it will mean this, unless somewhere in this grand alliance the stupid and sinister folly of ulterior ambitions shall invite the enemy to postpone our victory through our own rivalries and our own confusion."

He went so far as to suggest a binding treaty among the major allies, which of course included Russia, in order to make sure that there would be no new aggression after the peace treaties of World War II had been written. "I know of no reason," said he, "why a hard and fast treaty between the major allies should not be signed today to achieve this dependable end." That was the vision of a great statesman in the Senate who felt that it was necessary for all mankind to work together in unity to achieve permanent peace. We know now that one of the Allies, the Government of Russia, to which VANDENBERG was willing to offer a guaranty to protect it against aggression by a revived Germany or Japan, not only spurned the thought of such an alliance, but itself has become an overt aggressor and, in the words of Secretary of State Acheson, has sought "to break up, by destructive acts, the work of the United Nations."

If Russia should succeed in breaking up the work of the United Nations, or should succeed in securing dominance over that organization, the result would obviously be that a world institution conceived in the spirit of peace would be perverted into an instrument of tyranny over the minds and the bodies of men.

It is the realization of this danger which has prompted President Truman to assert that this country and the other nations of the free world stand in their gravest peril. The people who aspire to govern themselves must stand together, for only in unity can they protect themselves.

If this free world should shrink now to embrace only the Western Hemisphere, if the European peninsula should be overrun by Communists, and all Asia should fall into the Soviet circle, then indeed would this Government and the principles of popular sovereignty for which it has always stood be in mortal danger. For this reason, the President has said that we cannot yield to aggression and will not engage in appeasement, but shall continue to make ourselves strong, to engage not only in military preparedness, but in economic preparedness also.

This is the reason for his summons to national units. This is the reason for his call for sacrifices without which we cannot be ready for the grim test that lies before us.

First of all, it must be understood that, in modern warfare, the home front, in truth and in fact, is the fighting front. It is the fighting front because it would be impossible to build the weapons of defense without the labor of all civilians. A modern fighting force could not exist without the active support of all. Modern warfare is as much economic as it is military. This is a lesson all must learn.

No group or class or individual can hope to make profit out of the program of preparedness upon which we are launched. It takes years before a long-range bomber can pass from the drawings upon the designer's board to the finished plane. Thousands of men must work upon the production of the raw materials which go into that plane. Other thousands must labor upon the fabrication of the commodities out of which the plane is made. Other thousands must put the parts together. Then, in seemingly unrelated industries, are produced commodities like aviation gasoline, without which the plane could not fly, and the materials which are used by the ground forces necessary to keep it in the air.

In other words, modern warfare and preparedness for war is an all-embracing economic enterprise. It calls for the cooperation of all our people because only all our people can produce and pay for the instruments that are needed.

If we are to do this, we must forget all thought of profit. We must be prepared, as the Government is urging, not to promote inflation by resisting taxes, by pushing prices upward, or by advancing wages. Profits, wages, and prices in the United States are at such levels now that fewer injustices would be inflicted by an over-all freeze than by any slower approach to the ceilings which must be imposed.

It has been well said that inflation is the enemy within the gate. An analysis of price increases of items upon the essential list of military procurement indicates that many of them have increased from 20 to more than 50 percent. Rubber tires for the Army in November 1950, were more than 38 percent more costly than in April; boots, 42 percent up; clothing, 39 percent up; parachutes, 51 percent up; mattresses, 65 percent up; and wire rope for the Navy, 100 percent up.

The dollars that we appropriated last fall for national defense will buy far less now to preserve the lives of our fighting men than they would have bought last June before Korea.

In very truth, inflation at home knocks our fighting planes out of the sky more effectively than Russian jet fighters in the hands of the Red Chinese army of aggression. Unless we check it immediately, next year we will be appropriating billions more to buy the military items that could be bought now at present prices.

Military costs are not the only costs affected by inflation. It is rapidly spreading to the prices of every item that the people buy and need. The cost of living at this moment is at an all-time high and it is bound to go higher. As it climbs skyward, the arguments for further wage increases become unanswerable.

When the Soviet Communists first began their campaign to take over China, they used every means in their power to promote inflation because they understood the economic basis of modern society and they knew that by increasing the cost of living, they would undermine the Nationalist Government.

By a united determination to halt inflation here at home, we can take the first and most effective step to protect ourselves against communism. We must be prepared, therefore, to respond in united fashion to the President's call for increased production and for the prevention of inflation. We must be prepared to sacrifice nonmilitary expenditures by Government on the Federal, the State, and the local level. We must be prepared to send the profit dollar to war by diverting profits to the national defense. By every dollar that we increase the debt of the United States we make more difficult the fight for freedom—we make more difficult the survival of the principle of private property.

Political and economic freedom are the ideals for which this country was founded. Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, once said, "I have sworn, upon the altar of God, eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man." Such a tyranny now threatens to take over the world.

Abraham Lincoln, in his immortal Gettysburg Address, called for the united determination of the people to dedicate themselves to the American ideal that "Government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

This is our test, and the first battle will be the battle fought here at home to halt inflation before it destroys us.

Secretary Acheson's Critics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HERBERT H. LEHMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD two very interesting letters from the columns of the New York Times of December 20. Both these letters deal with the move to force the dismissal of Secretary Acheson.

It is also interesting and worthy of note that the editor of the New York Times, in a note printed at the bottom of the Letters to the Editor column, states that a preponderance of letters in defense of Secretary Acheson are being printed in that column because the New York Times has received 10 letters in support of Secretary Acheson to every 1 letter critical of him in the present situation.

There being no objection, the letters and editor's comment were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECRETARY ACHESON'S CRITICS

AIMS OF OPPOSITION EXAMINED, LOSS OF CONFIDENCE CHARGE CHALLENGED

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

The Republican demand for the removal of the Secretary of State at a moment of national emergency has shaken the country and shocked our allies. No responsible statement of reasons adequate to so extreme and unprecedented a step has been offered, other than the claim that Mr. Acheson has "lost the confidence of the country."

Since the country has not declared its views, this assertion must be taken as merely rhetorical. Even as rhetoric it is dubious. If the reaction to the Republican demand in and around Boston is evidence, leaders of American opinion, Republican as well as Democratic, do not share the party's conviction on that point.

What, then, is the case against Mr. Acheson? We must assume, in respect for the Republican Congressmen, that it is something more than the dislike of some Members of Congress for his mustache, his clothes, and the precision of his use of the English language. We must assume, for the same reason, that it is something more than the McCarthyism that Mr. Acheson is soft to communism. You disposed of that insinuation in unanswerable terms in your editorial of December 16. No American in public life has a more consistent record of effective opposition to communism than the Secretary of State.

What, then, is the case? If it is not personal distaste or discredited gossip, what is it? Republican reference is made to far eastern policy in terms which suggest that Mr. Acheson has not been sufficiently hostile to communism in that part of the world.

We are fighting Communist aggression in Korea as the result of a courageous decision taken by Mr. Truman on Mr. Acheson's advice. Are the Republicans complaining that we are not fighting communism elsewhere in Asia as well? Specifically, are they complaining because we are not also at war with Communists in China? Is it their contention that Mr. Acheson has lost the confidence of the American people because he has pursued a policy aimed at avoiding war in China?

The country is entitled to a clarification of their position. It is no secret that there are Republican Senators and Republican publishers who would like to involve the United States in war in China. In the past they have been regarded as an irresponsible minority. Do they now make Republican policy? And is it in submission to their views that the United States must lose the services of an able, devoted and courageous Secretary of State at the moment when we need him most?

ARCHIBALD MACLEISH.

BOSTON, December 17, 1950.

DISUNITY FEARED

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

I wish to record my entire approval of your recent editorial regarding Secretary of State Acheson.

I have been shocked at the vituperative character of some of the attacks made on both Mr. Acheson and General MacArthur, whatever mistakes they may have made (and who has not made them?). I regard them both as high-minded, patriotic Americans undeserving of such treatment.

As for the Republican resolutions regarding Mr. Acheson, particularly in view of the meeting in Brussels, I can only think of them as an act of unparalleled political folly. The effect in European capitals is set forth in the dispatch of your London correspondent, Raymond Daniel.

What is needed in Washington is less quarreling and more cooperation (this applies to both Republicans and Democrats) and more patriotism. Let's close ranks and "git goin'."

A DISGUSTED REPUBLICAN.

NEW YORK, December 17, 1950.

(Space has been given in these columns to a preponderance of letters in support of Mr. Acheson for the reason that our mail has run approximately 10 to 1 in his favor.—Editor, the Times.)

The Great Struggle Is Yet To Come

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, the reversal the United Nations forces have suffered in Korea is not a defeat, nor is it the end of a battle. The United Nations forces went into Korea for the high moral purpose of enforcing peace.

The set-back given our advancing forces is most definitely, however, a warning that the road ahead is going to be difficult. As Secretary of Defense Marshall recently told the Congress of American Industry:

> We are in a period of the greatest tension and facing the possibility of * * * catastrophe. * * * The country is facing an unprecedented era in American life, and we have to do all in our power to prevent the state of affairs of today, bad as it is, from deteriorating into something dreadful to contemplate—another world war.

Secretary Marshall's warning was spoken almost 8 years to the day after a previous address to the same group of industrial leaders, at their annual dinner meeting, in the same room of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York. He was Chief of Staff of the United States Army then, and we had been only a few days less than 1 year involved in World War II. But we had won our first strategic success by the landing in North Africa, and though victory was 2½ years in the future, morale was high, and the miracle of American industrial production had begun to work.

Today, with the situation more grave than it was then, we have made less progress toward creating the strength we shall need for our protection and survival. Moreover we must do more for our allies than we had to do 8 years ago. Secretary Marshall's address to the Congress of American Industry was, therefore, more than a warning of the gravity of the situation. It was a clear statement of what has to be done. This build-up will be from the low state of last June "to a position from which we can at least see the peaks we may have to climb in case of all-out war." And Secretary Marshall warned:

> We must get there as quickly as possible, meanwhile rushing our planning for whatever further development will be necessary.

Summing up, Secretary Marshall pointed out that what we must do is not only to resolve the issue in Korea, and prepare for any eventualities that may arise; we must develop a system new to American practice that will be enduring, not a system that will collapse at any surface relaxation in the tension under which we live, and under which we must expect to live until peace and democracy are firmly established in the world.

Mr. Speaker, that is the great task facing the American Congress and the American people—to build the system that will endure in spite of the reverses of a single campaign and will stand us in good stead whatever the struggle that may come.

Mr. Speaker, I ask, therefore, unanimous consent to insert Secretary Marshall's statement of December 8, 1950, on his task, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The remarks are as follows:

Today is very reminiscent of 8 years ago. On December 4, 1942, to be exact, I appeared here in this same room at a meeting of your association to outline the military situation and to urge you to step up the production we so desperately needed at that time to provide equipment for the troops already in action and called to the colors and the millions yet to come—and for our allies as well.

Today the military situation is grave, more grave, I very much fear, than it was even in those most difficult days of 8 years ago. We had then won our first strategic success by the landing in North Africa, but there were years of bitter fighting ahead.

The American tendency to rush from pessimism to jubilant optimism, or the reverse, over the results of a single campaign and even the outcome of a single battle was then manifest and I remember cautioning you that the great struggle was yet to come. Tonight I would caution you that this is the time for a calm determination, a strong resolution to do what seems wise to protect the future security of the free world. It is no time for violent emotions.

In those critical days of that first success we lacked trained personnel to keep our engaged combat units up to strength. We lacked the quantities of matériel to keep them fully equipped and at the same time we were rapidly and vastly increasing our forces.

On the industrial front the problem of 1942 was quantity production to meet our own needs and those of our allies. We were holding bases and conducting world-wide operations. Tremendous demands had to be made on America's productive resources. The goals set seemed impossible to some. We were confronted, however, with a situation that left us no alternative. Our enemies had been preparing for the day of aggression for decades and had their men lined up and their munitions assembled. We were just recovering from the first shock of hostilities. We were in the process of mobilizing for the supreme effort that modern war demands.

Well, you are fully aware that you made good. You performed a miracle of production. You and labor and agriculture played a dominant role in the victories of 5 years ago.

Today our problems so far as they concern personnel and matériel are much the same as were those of the period I have been referring to. We are not in a world war but we are in a period of the greatest tension and facing the possibility of such a catastrophe, and we are engaged in the heaviest of fighting in the restricted area of Korea. The country is facing an unprecedented era in the American life and we have to do all in our power to prevent the state of affairs of today, bad as it is, from deteriorating into something dreadful to contemplate—another world war.

There appears to be a general agreement on the part of our political leaders and the public that we should build up our military strength as quickly as possible. There are two distinct phases to that process, one pertaining to personnel and the other to matériel. And there is the additional consideration as to what we do to build up the strength of our friends and allies.

The immediate and first step in the program we have decided upon calls for a build-up in manpower from the low state of last June at the time the North Koreans started on their course of aggression to a position from which we can at least see the peaks we may have to climb in case of all-out war. We must quickly reach a high plateau in this mountain range of preparedness from which we can look in all directions, firm in a position of readiness to act in whatever way that may be necessary, rapidly, but deliberately and effectively. The establishment of such a position is not a one-shot affair. In fact the maintenance of that base immediately becomes much the greater task.

What are we asking from the present Congress in the second supplemental deficiency appropriation is the establishment of such an initial base both in men and munitions. We must get there as quickly as possible, meanwhile rushing our planning for whatever further development will be necessary.

Another step in our search for strength lies in our military assistance program. Fortunately, Congress before adjourning last September provided $4,000,000,000 as the second installment of equipment for our allies. We are, furthermore, proceeding with a full program in research and development in all scientific fields, and doing this with the advice and cooperation of the leading scientists in this country, so that our weapons and means of operation will be the best in the world.

As to munitions, that is your field. I am particularly anxious not only that production be gotten under way as quickly as possible and pushed as rapidly as possible but even more concerned to see that we do this in such a manner as to assembly lines, necessary jigs and dies, and things of that nature, so that we can quickly and greatly accelerate production as it becomes necessary. We must have a stockpile of finished weapons but I am equally concerned that we now lay down a system which does not merely produce finished matériel for a stockpile but will enable us quickly and effectively to greatly increase production under forced pressure, if that be necessary.

We have to have in mind that while our great effort today is to maintain the security of our men in Korea and above and beyond that to take every practicable step to maintain the peace of the world, we must do our present job against the background that the best that we can hope for in the immediate years ahead is a prolonged tension. That, as I have just said, is the very best that we can hope for. Therefore, along with the immediate and rapid build-up of strength there must be the development of a system new to American practice that will be enduring, not a system that will collapse at any surface relaxation in the tension I refer to or because our people far distant from Western Europe and the Continent of Asia grow indifferent to the consequences of a relaxation in our measures of preparedness.

I will not elaborate further regarding the necessities concerned with the production of matériel. You are the experts in that field. I must confine myself to the military aspects and requirements of the day. But in closing my remarks, I would like to leave several comments and thoughts in your minds. The Chinese Communist intervention in Korea has placed a very heavy burden on the United Nations. It has deliberately challenged the United Nations. We must recoup this situation and put the United Nations back on the forward path toward world peace.

It is very important to remember that we went into Korea to sustain the United Nations in its great purpose of enforcing peace. Our purpose, therefore, was one of the highest moral principle. We must not be deterred by temporary military reverses.

It must be made unmistakably clear to all the world that we do not waiver in our purpose.

I would particularly emphasize that this is no time for purely emotional reactions. It is a time for determined resolution, a time for unity, and very much the time for calm consideration and the strong example of determination to do what is right for the world, which, of course, includes our own security in that world.

Address by President Hoover

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BRIEN McMAHON OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an excerpt from a broadcast by Elmer Davis over the facilities of the American Broadcasting Co., on December 21, 1950, regarding the recent address by President Hoover.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ex-President Hoover's speech last night had at least the merit of reducing the current controversies over foreign policy to elementary terms. When there is argument as to how much we should do in Asia and how much in Europe, Mr. Hoover boldly proposes that we do nothing anywhere but at home. The war in Korea, he says, is lost; a war in Europe would be lost; so he issues a clarion call to his fellow countrymen to crawl under the bed, shut their eyes, plug their ears, and hope for the best. With some of Mr. Hoover's whereases many citizens will be in agreement; though they may be only straw men that he has set up to knock down. I am confident for instance that the Joint Chiefs of Staff never had the slightest idea of trying to march an army overland to Moscow; or of getting our land forces involved in what Mr. Hoover calls the quicksands of China and India. But his criticism of the shilly-shallying of the United Nations over Communist China would find much agreement among administration officials. It is when he comes down to his be-it-resolved that Mr. Hoover begins to sound like the Hoover of old.

Not another man or another dollar for Europe, he says, until Europe has organized and equipped enough combat divisions to erect a sure dam against the Red flood. In other words, no more help for Europe till Europe no longer needs it. That this would involve a flat repudiation of the North Atlantic Treaty is perhaps the least of its implications. Mr. Hoover appears to realize, though he never explicitly admits it, that this policy would surrender Europe to the Russians. So, he says, let us build up our air and naval forces so as to hold the Atlantic and Pacific oceans—including Japan, Formosa, and the Philippines; we would be generous enough to let the British join us if they wanted to, but we don't need them; safe behind the beaches of New Jersey and California, we can reduce Government expenditure, balance the budget, and all live happily ever after. This, says Mr. Hoover, is not isolationism; indeed it is the opposite. Well, if that's so, they'd better rewrite the dictionaries.

Mr. Hoover admits that this would be an uneasy peace. It would indeed, if communism had absorbed Europe, Asia, and Africa; and the island of the Western Hemisphere stood alone against the resources of the rest of the world. It would be an uneasy military situation and an uneasy economic situation, if the rest of the world outside of Latin America refused to trade with us—as it well might, if it were ruled from Moscow. But Mr. Hoover sees no better hope for us.

It is some consolation to recall that Mr. Hoover never has had much hope for us, since the failure of his endeavor to abolish poverty. He was a defeatist 10 years ago, and he turned out to be wrong; he is a defeatist still, and the same kind of defeatist. He thinks we couldn't win a war abroad so he proposes a program which would insure that any land fighting that might occur would be right here, on our own improved real estate; and that we would have nobody else on our side. Not only his lack of faith in Europe, but his contemptuous language about all Europe except Spain and Germany, is just a surprise Christmas present for Russian propaganda. For Mr. Hoover's views command attention. How seriously they are to be taken, however, depends on how far they are supported by his party; and there his program seems to contain what a Marxist would call internal contradictions.

He would hold Formosa but would apparently conduct no offensive operations against the Chinese Communists; that won't suit the Chiang Kai-shek Republicans. He says the war in Korea has been lost; that won't suit the MacArthur Republicans and it doesn't suit headquarters in Tokyo, which maintains that the Army is undefeated.

Senators WHERRY, BRICKER, KEM, and CAPEHART agreed with Mr. Hoover completely; Senators TAFT and BREWSTER said his views should have the immediate consideration of Congress; but other Republican Senators are by no means prepared to abandon Europe. Governor Dewey declined comment on the speech, saying that his views were expressed in his speech of last Thursday. That speech was in itself sufficient comment, for it was the speech of a man who has faith in the United States.

The administration made no direct reference to the speech; but after the President heard the report of the Secretary of State, just returned from Brussels, he said that the spirit shown by the countries of Western Europe has justified our confidence that they mean business. Let there be no mistake about it, said the President—the unity of the nations of Western Europe and of the North Atlantic area is vital to their security; and to ours.

But we shall have to see how many Americans feel that it would be safer to crawl under the bed, shut their eyes, and hope for the best.

America's Responsibility in Present World Conditions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND
OF ARIZONA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement by the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] regarding America's responsibility in present world conditions.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR KERR SAYS

WASHINGTON, December 21.—Now is the time to face the naked realities which confront us, to recognize the dangers about us.

Now is the time to accurately appraise what is necessary to meet and match and overwhelm those dangers; to determine that, come what may, we will do all that is required to insure complete and enduring security.

We are at war. Call it cold war, or hot war, or whatever other name you choose.

We did not seek it. We have done everything we knew to prevent each step in the inexorable march of events that has forced the present terrible conflict upon us.

We are still determined to limit the shooting war, whenever and however it may honorably be done.

But we can no longer, not for another precious minute, fight for peace from a position of weakness. Fight for peace, we must, for all we are worth, but from a position of rapidly growing and increasing power.

We have a great determination to win peace, if it is humanly possible. But we have an even greater and grimmer determination that this beloved Nation must and shall survive.

We are face to face with the most brutal and ruthless and awful danger we have ever known. Anything less than our best is not enough to meet it. The cost of victory will be very great, but the cost of defeat would be slavery.

Now is the time to mobilize our vast and boundless strength. We must move rapidly into total mobilization—mobilization of our dollars, our manpower, and all of our mighty forces.

We must also mobilize our spiritual and moral resources. We must fortify our courage and renew our faith. The God of our fathers is still supreme and is available to guide us against the atheistic enemy.

We will not quail in the presence of whatever dangers that may come. We will not falter before difficulties or hardships.

We are the strongest nation on this earth. We, and we alone, will determine the outcome of the global struggle being fomented and whipped up against us. We are resolved to win, but to do this, each American must do his or her part. Some must fight, some must produce, all must work and all must pay.

But first, all must unite. In unity there is strength and security and victory.

Our enemies are working cunningly and hellishly to divide us. They seek with stealth and lies to undermine our confidence in ourselves and our leaders and our country. They laugh in fiendish glee as they see us dissipate any of our precious time or strength in bickering and backbiting and internal strife.

Let us confuse them by treating their schemes with disdain. Let us bitterly disappoint them by repudiating their lies and laughing in their evil faces as we refuse to let them entice us into the trap of disunity.

We have a common foe, we have a common peril. That foe is communistic aggression. That peril is the effort of the men in the Kremlin and of their almost unlimited military manpower to enslave the free world.

We can overcome the danger which confronts us. We can build and maintain the military strength, the united valor, the combined courage, the unfaltering faith in our God and our people that will insure our victory.

The All-American team of all Americans is on the march. Under one flag, as one people under one God, we will meet and rise victorious over every threat and every danger to our homes, our freedom, and our country.

I know we will win. Now is the time.

Alabama Airport Construction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CARL ELLIOTT
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, in 1935, Alabama had 28 airports. Today there are 110 usable fields in the Alabama airport system, not including military bases.

There is still a great need for airports and air strips for the smaller towns.

As a part of my remarks, I include an article entitled "Alabama Airport Construction," taken from the Alabama Aviation News, published by the Alabama Department of Aeronautics, of which Hon. Asa Rountree, Jr., is director. The article from the Alabama Aviation News follows:

ALABAMA AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION

The Alabama Department of Aeronautics, under the present management, which dates back to 1935, has either arranged or assisted in arranging for over $26,000,000 worth of airport construction, property and facilities. This has developed the Alabama airport system from a small pioneer one into a network of major size, with State-wide coverage.

In 1935 there were airports in only about 28 localities and most of them were substandard in comparison with current specifications. Since that time there have been airports in 97 localities.

One hundred and two new public, commercial, private, and personal fields have been built or acquired; also four commercial seaplane bases. Two new fields are pending. Twenty other public fields were improved. Eleven public fields and six commercial fields, closed during World War II, were reopened. Seven public fields, initially on leased property, have been purchased by the municipalities concerned.

This department has assisted all of them. In its planning and negotiations, it has visited and contacted officials in over 150 localities. Most of these are also contacted regularly from year to year.

Today there are 110 usable fields in the Alabama airport system, not including 16 military bases and auxiliary fields.

With one exception, Alabama's major airport system, as to localities currently requiring or justifying major airports, is now complete. However, it must be recognized and understood that there is, and will be, a continuing need for additional improvements and facilities as operations grow.

In 1935 there were only two class 3 airports and only one had a paved runway. A class 3 airport has a minimum length of 3,600 feet. Today there are 18 major airports, class 3 and larger, with a total of 45 paved runways. Only one of them is without paving.

Back in 1935 only one airport had runway lights. Today 14 have them, including two where installations are now pending.

Alabama's secondary system of airports for the smaller towns still needs considerable attention and many additional projects. As aviation develops, the time will come when every town of any size will have need of at least a single flight strip, not only for its own benefit but also for transient traffic, to facilitate cross-country flying and to provide additional safety. Airfields and landing strips will be just as essential to every community and every area as highways now are.

Specific attention has been, and is being, given to the needs of the small towns and their interests are being anticipated, represented and protected at all times by this department.

A State-wide network of intermediate emergency strips between localities and in isolated areas along principal air routes is also needed for safety. In time, a pilot should be provided with a convenient, nearby, developed landing strip, for emergency use, regardless of his air position. Again, just as highways are needed by every locality and in every area, for local and transient use, so will there be need for airfields and landing strips.

This department has continuously anticipated and planned for the needs of the Alabama Airport System. From the beginning, it has had a long-range master airport plan, covering both current, future, and potential needs. This was one of the first State plans in the country, served as a pattern for a number of States and antedated the first Federal plan by nearly 4 years. It has been, and is being, constantly revised and is kept on a current basis at all times.

With this plan, the department has been in a position to promptly suggest, recommend, and justify projects, for all Federal participation programs: Works Progress Administration (1935–42); Municipal Airports National Defense (1941–45); Federal Aid for Airports (authorized in 1946) and Surplus Military Airport Disposal (initiated in 1946).

The airpark plan, pioneered in Alabama during the Civil Works Administration in 1933–34, by Col. Sumpter Smith, who was lost during the war; Col. Theodore Swann, later the first chairman of the old Alabama Aviation Commission, and Hayden Brooks, now chairman of the present Alabama Aeronautics Commission, has been continued. This plan, adopted for the use of smaller towns, combines recreational facilities with aeronautical facilities, thus making the airport of interest and service to the entire community. It has received national recognition, has been adopted in a number of States, and was presented by the United States delegation to the International Aviation Conference held in Lima, Peru, in 1938.

The Magic of Christmas

OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, with permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I attach the following article from the December 13, 1950, issue of the Pathfinder magazine. The article, written by Pathfinder Publisher Mr. Graham Patterson, I feel, so effectively describes the feelings, hopes, and aspirations of so many of us on the eve of the coming holy season. The Pathfinder article follows:

THE MAGIC OF CHRISTMAS

We are now in the midst of that heaven-blessed season whose magic mellows the mind of man. Christmas comes but once a year, but the world would be a better place if it came oftener—or at least its spirit.

For no one can doubt the transcendent power of the Christmas season. It can be seen everywhere—in the home, on the streets, in public places. In the patience of tired holiday shoppers. In the pleasant greeting of stranger to stranger. In reborn courtesy and friendliness.

Wouldn't it be wonderful if the world were like this all the time, instead of just during the Christmas season? There is no sound reason why it shouldn't be. The universal feeling of good will during these happy holidays proves that man can drop his antagonisms, his jealousies, his intolerance—and be enriched spiritually for it. The Yuletide brings the supreme manifestation of man's finer self. Why can't it be continued throughout the entire year?

Such a happy state could be attained by following the precepts of the golden rule. Do unto others as you would have others do unto you. Treat your fellow men as you would like to be treated.

Our actions are largely a matter of habit. And good habits can be formed as easily as the bad. In the hustle and bustle of making a living, we are too often apt to dispense with the simple courtesies, the little acts of thoughtfulness that we like to receive from others but which we are prone to forget. Yet others appreciate such things just as much as we do, and respond with equal good will. The investment is little, the dividends are great.

Jesus, by His example and teachings, showed the world how man should conduct himself toward his brothers. It has been a far better world because of His teachings. Yet it is discouraging that in not one of the nineteen and one-half centuries that have since elapsed has the world been completely at peace.

The pessimist would conclude that peace on earth, good will to men, is an unattainable utopia; that man is not big enough in mental or spiritual stature to meet the simple standards that Christ laid down.

But such a conclusion is challenged millions of times a day, in millions of places throughout the land, during this joyous season.

No one ever tires of the wonder of Christmas. No one is immune to its blessed contagion. Even old Scrooge, in Dickens' immortal story, finally succumbed to its magic. What other occasion could make the wheels of industry come to a halt, draw families, friends, and neighbors closer together, and give birth to a world-wide festival of good will?

Christmas is truly a magic time. For its magic makes men think better of each other, brings patience and tolerance and understanding and true neighborliness.

That is the miracle of Christmas. A miracle that happens every year, yet seems new every year. A miracle that uplifts man to his highest spiritual level and gives him an encouraging glimpse of the kind of world that was intended to be.

A very merry Christmas to you all.

GRAHAM PATTERSON,
Publisher.

Tribute By Radio Commentators to Hon. Lyndon B. Johnson, of Texas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST W. McFARLAND
OF ARIZONA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, December 22 (legislative day of Monday, November 27), 1950

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, in recent weeks, two prominent radio commentators, noted for their objectivity and frankness have paid unusual tribute to the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the work he is doing now as chairman of the Preparedness Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

In a broadcast on November 21, Mr. Edward R. Murrow, distinguished commentator for the Columbia Broadcasting System, paid particular tribute to the frankness and fairness of the reports of the subcommittee of the Senator from Texas which has done such an outstanding job of awakening the Government agencies to the urgency of our present crisis. On December 15, another broadcaster, Mr. Eric Sevareid, paid particular tribute to the speech which the Senator from Texas delivered in the Senate on December 12 warning that the policy of "wait and see" must end.

I believe that these reports by two of our best-known and universally respected radio newsmen should be widely read, and I ask unanimous consent to place transcripts of their broadcasts in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tributes were ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

BROADCAST OF EDWARD R. MURROW, CBS, NOVEMBER 21, 1950

Throughout much of our history the chairmen of some Senate and House committees and subcommittees have risen from political obscurity, and achieved national attention, as the result of their committee reports. This business of committees and subcommittees is really the only method we have whereby our elected representatives can check up on how the Nation's hired hands are doing.

There is a Senate subcommittee presided over by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON of Texas, which can be counted upon to make a lot of news in the future. It has the title of "The Preparedness Subcommittee on Armed Services of the United States Senate." Its job, as I understand it, is to find out how well we are prepared for war, and with what. The committee's second report, released about half-an-hour ago, does not make very agreeable reading. The report states: "It ill becomes Government officials to conduct the public business with less prudence than they would display in operating a charity bazaar. But that has happened."

The committee says, "there has been more progress in paper work preparedness, than in actual performance by some of the defense agencies. And this kind of paper-work preparedness is only flimsy protection against the threat we face." These quotations may sound like just another case of politicians belaboring bureaucrats. But Senator JOHNSON's subcommittee doesn't mind being specific. Our rubber situation is labelled as "far from satisfactory. At present, industry supplies of rubber are far less than those on hand at the time of Pearl Harbor." The Department of Commerce placed limitations on the use of rubber, and then nullified that order by granting a lot of exemptions. Some of our allies are gouging us on rubber prices.

In an earlier report this subcommittee revealed how an individual had bought aircraft computers for $6.89; and how they were subsequently bought back by the Government for $63,000.

Today's report reveals that an alcohol plant in Kansas City was sold without any clause which would permit the Government to recapture it in time of national emergency. At Omaha, Nebr., another alcohol plant that cost the Government better than $7,000,000, the Government agreed to sell for $1,750,000. The subcommittee has doubts about this deal, since a subsidiary of the company that bought it is now pleading financial irresponsibility in the courts. At Cotton Valley, La., an aviation gasoline plant was sold for dismantling without any security clause which would have permitted the Government to recapture it.

This apparently was a case where one Government department didn't inform another of what it was doing, or had agreed to do.

Then there was the matter of surplus sales at Robins Air Force Base in Georgia. An Under Secretary of the Air Force told the subcommittee that all surplus sales by the Air Force had been halted on July 10. The subcommittee looked into the matter and found out that the sales were not stopped until July 25—2 weeks later.

This Preparedness Subcommittee has some pretty harsh things to say about the Munitions Board, the Commerce Department, the General Services Administration, and the Air Force. But it documents its criticism with specific cases of carelessness, confusion, or incompetence.

If congressional committees inquiring into the activities, affiliations, or beliefs of individuals presented such well-documented reports as this one—which of course was inquiring into Government agencies and corporations—then the individual citizen would have more information on which to base conclusion. Of course, it is rather easier to prove, or discover, what a corporation or a Government agency actually did than it is to determine what an individual believes. Certainly Senator JOHNSON's subcommittee believes that our preparedness, particularly in the matter of rubber, is not proceeding with urgency or effectiveness.

The planning of our preparedness is a complex and often confusing thing. Mark Twain once said, "It is easy to make plans in this world (even a cat can do it). But when one is out in remote oceans it is noticeable that a cat's plans and a man's are worth about the same." Senator JOHNSON'S subcommittee apparently agrees with Benjamin Franklin that "A little neglect may breed great mischief."

Good night, and good luck.

BROADCAST OF ERIC SEVAREID, CBS, DECEMBER 15, 1950

The President of the United States has just finished communicating his thoughts to all the people; he has said what he believes we must now do to be saved. It would be in accordance with the practices and precedents of news commentation for this reporter now to attempt to analyze the contents and the meanings of the President's speech. That prerogative will undoubtedly be exercised by all those privileged of personal expression, whether by radio or press, throughout tomorrow, and for some days to come. But, more than in any other speech of his tenure, the President, a few minutes ago, was attempting to reach the minds, not of columnist or commentator, or of any special-interest groups, but of all and each of the American people as private, responsible citizens of the Republic. And it seemed to us that these particular 5 minutes follow a little too closely upon the President's message; we shall not infringe upon the effects of that message, with any kind of analysis or comment, on the President's words, at a moment when most of you are still absorbed with your own reflections about them.

We thought that we could not do better in this special circumstance, than to serve as a relay for some other words, which appear today in the Washington Evening Star. The editors of this sober and responsible journal have done what many of us should ourselves have done earlier this week, and rescued from the oblivion of official records, part of a speech to the Senate by LYNDON JOHNSON, Senator from Texas, who is the chairman of what is familiarly known as the Senate's watch-dog committee on the preparations in motion to assure the safety of this country. Senator JOHNSON had this to say:

"Is this the hour of our Nation's twilight, the last fading hour of light, before an endless night shall envelop us and all the western world? That is a question," he said, "which we still have in our power to answer. If we delay longer, we can expect nothing but darkness and defeat and desolation. If we answer the challenge with courage and confidence, and with the ability of which we are capable, we can, I am sure, triumph over our foes."

The young Senator from Texas occupies the same position with the same responsibilities of goader, of appointed prodder of President and the military, that Senator Truman occupied in the years of the last great war, and it may serve some purpose for you to lay alongside the convictions and proposals of President Truman, those of his young successor as the people's advocate.

Senator JOHNSON is opposed to the cautious approach, the approach suggested by General Marshall and others, who have expressed fears that if we mobilize all out, even though that takes much time, the Russians may pull back from the brink of war and leave us in a dire economic and psychological predicament. JOHNSON is opposed to the idea of waiting to see the course of events more clearly. He believes we see it with perfectly clarity now. And what he sees, and says, is this, in his own words, "First, we are at war. We are at war not merely with Communist China, but with all the military strength and both the physical and human resources behind the iron curtain. We have been at war for 6 months. We may well be at war for 10 or 20 years more. Second, our primary and immediate goal in this war is survival. This is a bleak, disturbing reality. In other wars, our goal has been simple victory. Now, however, we must make our survival certain before we can hope for victory, because we cannot be confident of survival. Third, we are not getting ready for war. We are in a war, but all our effort is seemingly directed toward staying out of the war that we are in already. This," concludes the Senator, "is adolescent nonsense." That is his premise, and given his premise, one of his conclusions is this: That we must not let the Russians decide where we shall fight and where we can fight.

This is Eric Sevareid in Washington.

Proposed Amendment to First War Powers Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. KENNETH B. KEATING
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, when the bill to extend the First War Powers Act is taken up on January 1, I expect to offer an amendment to meet the objection to the legislation which has been raised by many Members of Congress. They have contended that the grant of power in the bill might authorize the President to create an entirely new department of government. They have referred particularly to the President's often-expressed desire to create a Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, headed by Federal Security Administrator Oscar Ewing.

This amendment would bar the President from abolishing or transferring an executive department, or its functions, or from establishing any new executive department. It also would prevent the President from changing the name of an executive department or the title of its head.

This amendment has been submitted to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the hope that it may be accepted by the committee and recommended for favorable House action.

Although I seriously doubt that the President would have power under the emergency provisions of this bill to create a new executive department, I feel it should be made entirely clear that it is not the intention of Congress to give him that power.

The Congress has already emphatically expressed its disapproval of his plan to make Mr. Ewing a Cabinet official through the device of creating a new executive department. It should be made impossible for the President, whatever his desires might be, to flout the will of Congress in this regard.

On the other hand, it seems to me the constructive approach to the President's request for this legislation is to endeavor to amend it so as to afford adequate protection against arbitrary action, rather than simply to oppose the legislation entirely.

We face a fight for survival as a free nation. All of us in positions of legislative responsibility, regardless of party, should strive sincerely and untiringly to work together to place on the statute books whatever legislation is needed to cope with the gigantic task before us. I shall not be a party to any obstructive tactics to achieve political advantage. By the same token, we Republicans have a right to expect that the President and his advisers will take the same position.

We have been asked to give to the President the same emergency powers which he had in World War II. We are told that he must have this 1941 law revived in order to accomplish the mobilization plans which are so vital to the maintenance of our national security and defense. Whether we happen to be pleased or displeased over the personnel who are now administering our laws is not the question before us. We can deal with that problem at the proper time. Our present duty is to give to the President and executive departments adequate legislative authority to move, and move quickly, although the road of national preparedness, without losing sight of our equally important duty to insure that Congress does not surrender its proper functions under the Constitution.

I believe the amendment which I have suggested should meet the objections to this legislation and should result in favorable action by the House of Representatives.

When To Retire a Pilot?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. ENGLE of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD by including a recent article in the Washington Sunday Star of December 3, 1950, in regard to the retirement of pilots on commercial airlines. The article by Frederick R. Neely I believe will be an interesting contribution on this subject matter. The article is as follows:

SOME COMPANIES PENSION FLIERS AT 60, BUT THERE ARE MANY ADVOCATES OF LOWER LIMIT

(By Frederick R. Neely)

"What'll become of our old airline pilots when they get old?" Years ago this was the topic of much hangar flying when the budding air-transport industry was filling up with handsome, wasp-waisted, hairy-headed, healthy young airmen, but the question went unanswered for want of a satisfactory definition of "old."

Since then the subject has been elevated to the stature of a problem of growing concern in the high offi es of the airlines, the pilots' union and the Government. Here is how it presently stands:

Eight of the 34 United States scheduled trunk and feeder airlines have established cooperative pension plans for their pilots and fixed 60 as the retirement age. The remainder have no such retirement provisions, pleading financial inability to bear their share of the cost desired by the pilots.

The Airline Pilots' Association (A. F. of L. affiliate) has supported the principle of 50 as the age limit beyond which the modern airliner captain should not be required to fly, it being presupposed he has had at least 20 years of service on his airline when he reaches the half-century mark.

The Government, through the Civil Aeronautics Administration, has power to deny renewal of a license to an airline pilot for physical disability, but it has not yet recognized any age limit for compulsory retirement.

A week after this informal action (or on November 13) a 53-year-old airline captain died suddenly from a heart attack in the pilot's compartment of a DC-6 just 15 minutes before he was scheduled to take off from LaGuardia Field, N. Y., for Memphis, with 27 passengers standing by to board the plane. The story, widely published, generated speculation among airmen as to what would have happened to the big four-engined airliner if the captain had collapsed over his controls and jammed them as the plane was climbing out of the field, despite the presence of an alert copilot at his right side with duplicate controls.

Victim of the fatal heart attack was healthy looking Capt. John S. Pricer, with 21 years' experience as an airline pilot for American Airlines and with 21,000 hours in his log. He had been flying for 32 years, having been taught by the Army in the First World War. His preairline flying included 3 years as an Army pilot and a short stretch of barnstorming as a civilian. This was followed by a turn at earth-bound business (newspaper advertising, cash registers, and automobiles), with flying as an avocation, until 1929, when he grabbed the opportunity to become an airmail pilot for an American Airlines predecessor company. In World War II he went back into the Army, flying men and material for the Air Transport Command. His only mishap as an airline pilot came when flying the mail in a single-engined plane 20 years ago this month. Weather closed off all landing possibilities and with fuel exhausted he bailed out. Since 1936 (except for his war service) he and his wife lived quietly on their 30-acre cotton farm near Memphis while he flew the Memphis-New York route. It was to this farm he planned to retire when he reached 60 under American's pension plan.

RESULT OF PILOT POLL

Public interest in this stalemated internal question had not been aroused until the occurrence of two events a short time ago. In Chicago, during the annual convention of the ALPA early in November, the retirement-age question was brought up again and an opinion poll taken among the pilot delegates. They reaffirmed the age-50 retirement-pension "principle" on the theory that the tension, strain, and responsibility of flying the mail and passengers on schedule reduces the life expectancy of a line pilot by 10 years, so that at 50 he is physically comparable to a nonflying normal man of 60.

PROCTOR'S CASE CITED

The 50-year retirement advocates among airline pilots called Captain Pricer's sudden death tragically prophetic. They take the position that the advent of larger, faster, and more complicated airliners and increasingly congested airway and airport traffic, plus the inability of line pilots to enjoy regular eating, sleeping, and rest habits due to flight-schedule requirements and interruptions create mental and physical fatigue which can cause severe damage to the heart and nervous systems. (The CAA's Medical Division has an airline pilot-fatigue study under way, but no conclusions have been reported to support or discount the implication that after 50 an airline pilot becomes a greater health (and safety) risk.)

Airlines with 60-year retirement-income plans and airline pilots who go along with that figure regarded Captain Pricer's death as more of a tragic coincidence and directed attention to the case of Capt. W. H. Proctor, senior pilot of American. On June 1 last he flew a load of passengers out of New York in a DC-6, gently landed it on the Chicago Airport, and climbed down from the cockpit for the last time. He was 59 then. The following day he became 60 years old and also become the first airline pilot to retire under the company's mandatory 60-year rule, which carries with it a small pension.

Captain Proctor had completed 22 years of active airline flying with American on that date. He, like Captain Pricer, was taught to fly by the Army 32 years ago. When that war was over, he went into the real estate and hardware business in Florida and also served as municipal judge of a Miami suburban town. He kept in touch with aviation, though, and when a mail contract was awarded a company since absorbed by American, he signed up as an airmail pilot in 1928. Also like Captain Pricer, he took time off from American Airlines to go to war with the Air Transport Command.

Captain Proctor didn't stay retired for long. He is back with American as "ground instructor."

If the pros and cons of this question of age-retirement and health-hazards were limited to these two nearly identical "over 50 airline pilot histories, the odds would appear in favor of the 60 group as personified by Captain Proctor. Unfortunately, it is not that elementary. Settlement of the problem fairly and equitably to the pilots, the airlines and the public at this period of divergent views calls for a super-Solomonic arbitrator.

OLD ONES SAFER?

He not only would have to deal with tons of statistics on life expectancy, aircraft performance and airline operations, but on questions of pilot pride, personal hardship cases, company-pilot obligations; Government-pilot obligations, national defense and the economic problems of the airlines unable to afford pilot retirement-income protection. He would also need to handle a delicate sentimental situation and take some action to prevent destruction of a delicate sentimental belief held by a cautious segment of the public that the oldest pilots are the safest pilots; fact that they are still alive after flying all through the pioneering years is compelling testimony for that belief. Or, offer conclusive proof that after a certain age, "old" pilots are "unsafe."

There are now about 80 active airline pilots between the ages of 50 and 59 flying regular runs. They are considered by the CAA medical examiners, the airlines and themselves as fit and able for the exacting and specialized task of scheduled airline operations. There also are about 250 in the 45 to 49 age group; nearly a thousand in the 40 to 44 bracket; around 1,500 between 35 and 39 and close to 3,000 who are 30 to 34 years of age. The younger set numbers about 2,100 and they are between 20 and 29.

The average age of pilots voluntarily dropping out of airline service in anticipation of flunking their next physical examination due to an ailment not responding to treatment or who were denied license renewal for physical disability is now 42, according to the ALPA. Airline pilots who have died from natural causes in the past 20 years number 47 and the number killed in airline flying accidents for the same period is close to 300. (These vital statistics are not geared to age groups.)

However, along with tension and nervous strain, they are characterized as "hazards of airline flying" by chief advocate of the age-50 retirement plan by ALPA's hard-driving president and founder, David L. Behncke, of Chicago, pioneer airmail and airline pilot who was reelected to his eleventh consecutive 2-year term at the convention early last month. Dave Behncke has driven many a hard bargain for his "boys" with the Government and the airlines, but so far he has been unsuccessful in driving his pilots into complete agreement on the 50-year retirement deal.

PILOTS' PROBLEMS

Too many personal tangible and intangible problems stand between their endorsement of the "principle" of 50 and their forming a solid front to make it a part of every airline collective bargaining contract or to gain it through legislation. The lack of unity among the pilots—and they've had the matter before them for over 2 years—is attributed in part to those who purchased expensive private insurance and retirement income plans years ago, are still paying on them and therefore cannot afford to participate in any cooperative company plan. Then there are pilots who now participate in company plans established in the last decade who don't want to upset or reduce that retirement protection much as they would like to see the age limit cut to 50 (and a higher contribution toward retirement by the companies). Others around the 50 mark with no protection, and who live in constant fear that their next physical examination will be their last, are indifferent to any long-range retirement planning.

One of the first to establish a pilot retirement income plan is United Air Lines, whose cooperative effort became effective January 1, 1941. Under it, a pilot who joins the plan at age 25 and contributes continuously until he retires at age 60, would receive a pension of $4,700 per year. This is based on a salary figure of $9,000 per year in the latter part of his career.

Pilots long on the United payroll when the plan became effective and who joined it then will have a retirement income of between three and four thousand dollars per year. As an example: A pilot signed up for the plan on January 1, 1941, when his age was 40, and he was earning $9,000 per year. He was employed by the company when he was 28, and so has 10 years of past service (since his thirtieth birthday) under the plan. He continues to earn $9,000 per year and contributes continuously ($56.25 per month) on such amount until he retires at age 60. His total retirement income per year then will be $3,585.

Neither the airline companies nor the pilot groups are to be blamed for the lack of a uniform, industry-wide retirement income plan for pilots. The industry has expanded amid confusion and economic and political upheavals; the future of some companies has been in doubt and pilot careers uncertain. But this problem will never settle itself. Nor can it be allowed to drift much longer without expert, thorough examination and action.

Invitation to Disaster

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an editorial appearing in the Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star on December 24, 1950, entitled "Invitation to Disaster":

INVITATION TO DISASTER

The fact that Secretary Acheson has seen fit to call upon the National Security Council as a rebuttal witness is a measure of the seriousness with which the administration views Herbert Hoover's call for a retreat from Western Europe. (The Security Council says such a retreat could lead only to surrender or defeat.)

Mr. Acheson and the others have good reason to be deeply concerned with the Hoover speech. For it was an appealing statement—a speech which was bound to evoke a warm and enthusiastic response from millions of Americans. But it was also a speech which may well have contained within it the seeds of our own destruction, and it is proper, therefore, to examine and reexamine it.

When Mr. Hoover said that he spoke "with a sense of deep responsibility," he was wholly sincere. He has passed that point in life when men may be tempted by some hope of personal advantage, when partisanship seems worthwhile merely for the sake of partisanship. In the Star's opinion, Mr. Hoover spoke as an American citizen whose sole concern in these dark times is to serve the best interests of his country. Nevertheless, this newspaper believes that the course which the former President has advocated is a course which, if followed at this time, can lead us only to disaster.

When the speech is boiled down to its essence, Mr. Hoover is saying that we should pull back from Europe unless the western Europeans build for themselves a defense capable of turning back a Russian attack. If anything is certain, it is that Europe, without our vigorous assistance and support, will never erect such a defense. And the alternative, in Mr. Hoover's opinion, is to arm ourselves to the teeth and maintain our own defense, with the Atlantic and the Pacific as our outward bastions.

The first trouble with the advocacy of such a point of view is that it tends to frighten the Europeans into doing nothing. Without our help, they cannot and will not fight in any effective manner. If they do not fight, if they do not erect what Mr. Hoover calls a "sure dam" against Communist aggression, the overwhelming probability is that Russia wil take over Western Europe. What then?

Mr. Hoover does not advocate that we fight in such an eventuality, but rather that, while pursuing our own rearmament, we adopt a wait-and-see policy.

What we should expect to see is a Russian exploitation and development of the skilled manpower and the industrial resources of Western Europe. Instead of having 160,000,000 people alined with us, they would be working for the Russians. Mr. Hoover says there is no more danger that the Russians could invade Washington than that we, with land armies, could reach Moscow. That is quite true. But what about the ability of Russia, once the resources of western Europe are at her disposal, to launch an all-out, devastating atomic attack on this country? All that Mr. Hoover says on this point is that the atomic bomb is a far less dominant weapon than it was once thought to be. Maybe so. But the prospect of living for an indefinite future under the constant dread of an overpowering atomic attack is not an attractive one. At best, it leaves with the enemy the initiative the choice of the time and means of attack. And at worst, it invites the prospect that this country might be destroyed without any effective chance to fight back.

Mr. Hoover seems to think that his proposal offers hope, after the initial preparation, of reduced expenditures, a balanced budget, and freedom from the dangers of inflation and economic degradation. The Star fears that this is the sheerest wishful thinking. We would be faced, for one thing, with a loss of our foreign trade. That might not be too important. What is important is that, as the Russians increased their military strength after the conquest of Western Europe, we would have to increase ours. We would never reach the point where we could sit back and say that we are strong enough, that we do not need more and newer weapons. Instead, we would have to live indefinitely in an armed camp, and that, even without actual war, would sap our resources, cancel out our freedoms, and, finally, bring on the economic degradation against which Mr. Hoover warns.

Mr. Hoover cautions in eloquent terms against appeasement. But that which he proposes actually would be the greatest act of appeasement of all. It is true that if Western Europe does not take every possible step to insure its own defense we probably will have to fall back to the line which Mr. Hoover wants us to occupy. But it would be a ghastly mistake to beat such retreat unless and until it becomes clearly necessary. The sensible thing for us to do is to try by every feasible means to encourage and help the Europeans to stand up to the common enemy. If they refuse to do that, then we must fall back. But let us not abandon this battle until we have really tried to fight it.

Many of the people who respond favorably to Mr. Hoover's counsel are also admirers of General MacArthur. Perhaps this is a good time to recall some advice that he has given.

More than a decade ago, when another ruthless enemy threatened the civilized world, General MacArthur wrote to a friend: "The history of failure in war can almost be summed up in two words: Too late. Too late in comprehending the deadly purpose of a potential enemy; too late in realizing the mortal danger; too late in preparedness; too late in uniting all possible forces for resistance; too late in standing with one's friends."

That is the advice of one of our ablest military commanders. So let us not be too quick to abandon our friends and prospective allies in favor of standing alone.

Depleting Our Essential War Materials

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL A. REED
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is of the utmost importance if we are to maintain our payrolls, protect our domestic economy, and insure our national security that the wholesale ECA shipments of copper, so essential to our national defense, be stopped. There is no doubt whatever that much of this copper has been siphoned over into Russia and Red China.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting a survey which was made by Paul O. Peters with reference to the shipments of copper to foreign countries:

CIVILIAN USE OF COPPER TO COME UNDER NPA CONTROLS SOON

(By Paul O. Peters)

In Washington it has been announced that within the next few days controls will be slapped on the domestic use of copper, cobalt, and cadmium. It has been generally known for many months that our supplies of copper would not be adequate for civilian demands and an expanded rearmament program. During World War II, the War Production Board reporting on the use of copper in 1944 stated among other things, that under a controlled materials plan direct military and export requirements had absorbed 90, 69, and 71 percent, respectively, of the brass mill, wire-mill, and foundry-copper and copper-base alloy products.

Recently the price of copper has advanced to 24½ cents a pound, comparable with a price of 29.19 cents, the highest price in 1917.

In spite of the domestic shortages, it appears that over a long period of time it has been the policy of the European Cooperation Administration to issue procurement authorization to the Marshall plan countries for large quantities of copper and copper products to be purchased in the United States, Latin America, and Canada.

Continuation of this policy on the part of ECA may prove highly disadvantageous to the American free-enterprise system, which furnishes the employment and provides the payrolls and profits from which the Government collects the taxes which makes an international charity organization such as ECA possible.

It is a shame to say it, but it appears there are some in the Federal Government and its agencies who actually appear to be dedicated to the proposition of foreigners first instead of America first.

As of October 31, 1950, under the Marshall plan, our taxpayers have been called upon to provide the funds for procurement authorization for copper in the total amount of $325,500,000. Since that time new authorizations have totaled $15,113,000 for copper and copper products of which more than one-third originated in the United States.

The details of the reported procurement authorizations for copper and copper products are shown in the table which follows:

Recent ECA procurement authorizations for copper and copper products, with countries of destination and origin

Date of authorization	Country of destination	Country of origin	Amount of authorization
Nov. 24, 1950	Austria	United States	$200,000
Nov. 29, 1950	Germany	do	1,000,000
Dec. 5, 1950	Denmark	Canada	52,000
Do	Trieste	United States	50,000
Dec. 6, 1950	Germany	Latin America	1,100,000
Do	Portugal	United States	28,000
Dec. 8, 1950	French North Africa.	Latin America	410,000
Do	Netherlands.	Canada	285,000
Dec. 13, 1950	Greece	United States	100,000
Do	Formosa	Japan	5,000
Dec. 15, 1950	Norway	United States	350,000
Dec. 20, 1950	Greece	Latin America	1,050,000
Do	do	United States	645,000
Dec. 21, 1950	France	Latin America	5,000,000
Do	do	United States	3,068,000
Do	do	Canada	1,200,000
Do	French North Africa.	Latin America	570,000
	Total procurement authorizations.		15,113,000

At the quoted procurement price of copper at wholesale the authorizations should be sufficient to procure about 60,000,000 pounds, or 30,000 short tons, of copper or copper products.

In 1945 the reported exports of copper totaled but 48,563 short tons, and the domestic consumption that year was reported at 1,542,403 short tons. Of the reported domestic consumption in 1945, the uses to which the copper was put is shown by the table following:

	Tons
Cathodes	258,719
Wire bars	562,404
Ingots and ingot bars	275,944
Cakes and slabs	163,023
Billets	108,985
Other uses	10,197
Stockpiles	163,131
Total	1,542,403

At the end of 1945 it was reported the metals reserve held 565,710 tons of electrolytic and fire-refined copper in cathodes, shapes, and "in process copper," all but a small part of which was in the United States, with the remainder in Canada.

Will We Continue Being "Taken for a Ride"?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Courthouse (Ohio) Record-Herald of December 20, 1950:

WILL WE CONTINUE BEING "TAKEN FOR A RIDE"?

Only a few months ago we heard Congressman CLARENCE BROWN make this statement before a meeting of the Washington Rotary Club here: "Some day our country will realize that we cannot buy friendship with mere dollars."

How true that statement was is reflected in developments during the past few months and weeks and how often those who heard him must have remembered what BROWN said.

Today we find many of our alleged friendly nations practically blackmailing this Nation for money and other help under threat of going communistic if we do not come across with plenty of money and even send our own soldiers over to protect them. They show little interest in protecting themselves.

We have dropped to a low degree in our acceptance, if not our understanding, of national and political morality.

It has been preached to us by those with vision for years, but we seemed to be cynical about such old fogey talk. We preferred to take a joy ride with the crowd that told us to follow them and get something for nothing. Easy living, plenty of money, even if it was borrowed, and no responsibility was the popular trend.

Now we are beginning to realize that we, or somebody, must pay the piper.

In the last 18 years our Nation's history is filled with incidents, which politics, based on the purchased vote with Government funds or favors, produced. The principles of integrity, soundness, and honest thrift have been discarded. Independence, dignity, and honest effort have been neglected as empty words. Cynicism is the rule rather than the exception.

We see supposedly friendly nations creating situations which they say demand our money, our arms, and other material considerations. Isn't it time to call a halt on some of this foolishness and take a stand of our own. We are more likely to regain respect that way, than to keep patting them on the back and telling them we'll take care of them.

What has happened that caused our leadership to fall to such a low degree? Have we gone so far that we cannot recover our poise, our belief in sound government, and a willingness to save ourselves by following a different type of leadership which tells us the truth about ourselves and makes us face realities?

The chickens are coming home to roost and we are beginning to see how shallow our past 15 years of policy has become. We have helped to produce softness at home and abroad among alleged friends and we are being paid back in discouragement, petty jealousies, bickering, dependency, and in many cases what amounts almost to betrayal.

We need a rededication of ourselves to the principles of those who gave us our Constitution. We need to be made to realize how far we have drifted away from the teachings of the patriotic men who founded our Government.

Have we the will and stamina to do this? We do not have to become isolationists to the point of refusing money or help where we definitely know it is going to be used properly and will do some good. But we had better get off this gravy train notion of throwing money, material, and our soldiers to the four winds.

It will buy us neither help nor friendship.

In the Name of Jesus

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio sermon delivered on the Chapel Hour over WBCM on Sunday, December 10, 1950, at 5:30 p. m., by Frederick Andrew Roblee:

"Then they left the presence of the council, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the name"—(Acts 5: 41 (R. S. V.)).

In the name of Jesus! What tremendous chapters in world history have been written in His name and under His banner! In this very critical time let us take courage as we consider again the tremendous story of the Christian witness in the past and today.

After the resurrection, the followers of Jesus went everywhere preaching the gospel and doing good in His name. They discovered that through the faith which He made possible, there was real power. Among the disciples, Paul, most clearly of all, saw that the new religion was not for Jews only but was for every man. Going first to his own countrymen—the Jews—in many cities of that first century Greek and Roman world, he did not content himself merely with trying to win them but turned also to the Gentiles. Thus very quickly Christianity moved out from its Jewish cradle.

WERE CALLED CHRISTIANS

The followers of Jesus, who were derisively called Christians, were first persecuted by the Jews, and then by the Romans. The accusations against the disciples were fantastic. The Romans said that they were atheists and were given to gross immorality and even cannibalism. They were described as "enemies of the human race" and everything possible was done to get them to renounce their loyalty to Christ. Everyone knows of the awful persecutions which the Emperor Nero inflicted upon them, as early as A. D. 64. All that was required of a Christian to escape a terrible death was to plead "not guilty" of belonging to the church and of being willing to burn incense to the gods. Nevertheless in spite of all abuse, the vast majority of Christians remained steadfast in their love for Christ, and the church grew.

Then in the year A. D. 313, a momentous turn came. The Emperor Constantine issued the Edict of Milan which granted freedom of religion and he himself became increasingly sympathetic to the Christian Church. Under his presidency, the famous council of Nicaea was held in 325 to discuss the doctrine of Jesus Christ. The influence of this formulation of doctrine is still strong in the church. By this time, the so-called barbarians were pressing fiercely in upon the frontiers of the Roman Empire which had become weaker and weaker. They were called barbarians then but some day they were to be known as the Germans, the French, the British, and the Italians. These invading hordes simply moved in and took over. The Gothic Chieftain Alaric captured and burned part of Rome in 410. Of course, there was great consternation. Many felt that the bottom had dropped out of everything. Seeking to lay the blame somewhere, the Romans accused the Christians of weakening and undermining the empire. A famous and effective answer to this criticism was given by Augustine, a North African bishop, in his book, The City of God. He rightly pointed out that the purposes of God do not stand or fall with the man-made city of Rome. Dark and tragic as those times were, Christians, in the name of Jesus, sought to win the barbarians, who were really the new European peoples, and in this they were amazingly successful. Augustine and those who followed his leading in being faithful to Christ were the harbingers of western civilizations.

However, there were many mistakes and difficulties ahead. Little by little the bishop of Rome had taken to himself the authority of pope. At first this word which means father was used of any bishop and the bishops of the church stood more or less on an equal footing with another. But the papacy emerged with increasing prestige and power as the bishop of Rome pressed his claim. His authority, however, was never recognized in the east, and the split between the eastern church and the western church became greater and greater. This unfortunate separation between Christians together with the growing temporal power of the popes made for much trouble. Although monasticism, the separating of oneself from the world to live a distinctly religious life, produced many noble and notable Christians, it also stood for a double standard of devotion and service to God. The idea that there are two standards—one for the rank and file of Christian people and another for the more devoted—was and still is far different from the New Testament position of the full responsibility of all. Another great evil of this period was the conversion of people en masse, sometimes at the point of the sword. As the king or feudal lord went, so also the people were supposed to go.

Of course, in the long period of 1000 years following the fall of the Roman Empire in 476, a period which is known as the Middle Ages, there were many notable expressions of love and truth as well as evil and bloodshed. Nor was this period without its courage and its chivalry. The armed fighter of the Middle Ages was the knight on horseback. He was a part of the feudal system but within the limitations and monstrous evils of this system, a knight was often a man of high honor and integrity who had come to his position by the road of hard self-discipline. Tennyson's Idylls of the King and Sir Walter Scott's Ivanhoe unquestionably idealize the situation very greatly but there was and still is about the thought of knighthood that which quickens not only the blood but also the mind and the heart. Even in our times, knighthood has its symbolic place.

THE REFORMATION

By the fourteenth century more and more serious perversions of the gospel had developed. Those who sought reform, such as John Wycliffe, in England, and John Huss, in Bohemia, were often treated very cruelly. John Huss was burned at the stake. But the spirit of God was moving in the hearts of men and the revival of learning and art, known as the renaissance, together with the invention of printing, gunpowder, and the discovery of the New World, opened the door upon a new era. There were many reformers before Martin Luther and by his day the underlying conditions were such that reformation was possible in the church; a reformation that was to shake not only the church but most of Europe to the foundations. In essence the Reformation was a return to the most simple and basic teachings and ways of the New Testament. It stood for the open Bible in the common language. Authority in all matters of faith and life was seen to be the Bible, when reverently and intelligently read under the guidance and inspiration of the Holy Spirit. The Reformation is a great story in itself. In the name of Jesus, Luther and Melanchthon accomplished much in Germany; Zwingli and Calvin in Switzerland; and Knox and Cranmer in Scotland and England.

The coming of Christianity to America is a very great and wonderful story also. The members of the Church of England settled in Virginia; the Calvinistic Puritans and Pilgrims in New England; the Dutch Reformed in New York; the Baptists in Rhode Island; the Roman Catholics in Maryland; and the Quakers in Pennsylvania. The Scotch and Irish Presbyterians and the Methodists did not localize geographically but spread everywhere. In his monumental seven-volume work, A History of the Expansion of Christianity, Yale historian Dr. Kenneth Scott Latourette calls the period from 1800 to 1914 "the great century" and it was just that for protestant Christianity expanded not only throughout North America but from North America to Latin America, Africa, and Asia. The nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth century has been a period of great missionary activity, comparable even to the work of Paul and Peter in the Roman world of the first century. In the name of Jesus, men and women have gone to every part of the earth to preach, to teach and to heal. It is a vast tremendous story, and the end is not yet. Something happened in 1914 that profoundly shook the optimism that prevailed during the early years of this century. With vivid accuracy, Dr. Latourette entitles the last volume of his great work, Advance Through Storm. It was never a more appropriate title than tonight.

ADVANCE THROUGH STORM

What does it mean, today, to advance through storm in the name of Jesus? If we are to understand this century we must see that mankind, for some time now, has been experiencing the birth pangs of world community. Four major factors have combined to make world community both possible and necessary. They are changes in the political, economic, technological, and religious aspects of modern life. World community is not an evil, not something to be feared and prevented if possible, but something in the plan and purpose of God. World community is a vast good but it is coming and can come into existence only with much struggle and sacrifice. Since the turn of the century, the great issue has been and continues to be progress toward world community, or else. Back of the headlines tonight, this is the fundamental issue. The next few weeks may see the end of the United Nations (and with it, that best hope we have for world peace in our time) or, under the awful blows of necessity, this world organization may become the new instrument for effective world cooperation, freedom, and peace. It seems to me that now is the time for all clear-thinking people to stand firm, not only against aggression, but even more for the essential unity of mankind. The most heartening thing tonight is the large measure of such unity and such united action among the peoples and nations which have already suffered so much through the devastation of war.

A hundred years ago, in the midst of a profound internal crisis, Abraham Lincoln said, "This Nation cannot long remain half slave and half free." The same words apply to the whole world tonight. This modern world cannot remain half slave and half free; half starved and half well fed; half pagan and half Christian. It will go in either one or the other direction. The true followers of Jesus have never feared to stand up and be counted on the side of humanity; on the side of truth, fairness, and brotherhood. From the days of William Carey, in India, and David Livingstone, in Africa, modern missionaries in the name of Jesus have been bearers of new life and new hope. In 10,000 needy places in the world the missionary has demonstrated better ways to think, to live, and to make man's life in the world more as God wants it to be. This is no time to pull in but rather to reach out with the Gospel of Christ; reach out to all men, even to the Communists.

Do we stand with Christ or against Him? We cannot really be neutral, you know. We must be for, or we are against. It is not easy to stand for the things He stands for. Peter and the other apostles were ordered not to preach in His name. They were beaten, imprisoned, and tortured unto death, but they rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for His name. Shall we help to write the story of the second half of the twentieth century in His name? Through faith there is power—sufficient power—in the name of Jesus.

His Three GI "Fathers" Say Farewell to a Boy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article published in the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star on December 25, 1950, by Hal Boyle, entitled "His Three GI 'Fathers' Say Farewell to a Boy":

HIS THREE GI "FATHERS" SAY FAREWELL TO A BOY

(By Hal Boyle)

KIMPO AIR BASE, KOREA, December 25.—Three young American bachelor soldiers wanted to bid their adopted son good-by.

Everybody was earnest and solemn. The three young dads felt it was farewell forever. Their little son they had come to love was too young to realize it was a real leave taking, but he felt the seriousness around him and was bewildered by it.

He is 7 years old—a tiny cherub-faced Korean boy, wearing a neatly tailored GI uniform and a fine warm fur and leather Korean cap. In the center of the cap gleamed two polished letters—U. S.

His three fathers had brushed up the best they could, but they weren't as fresh or as sharply pressed as their son.

This they didn't mind for like any parents, their minds were on their son. They had done the best they could for him. He was a symbol to them of what they wanted most in life—to be married and have happy children. And they were proud of him.

He looked so clean and healthy as he stood there, compared with the hundreds of ragged, shriveled, sick-faced Korean children around him. They were being evacuated by air from the war zone to an island off South Korea. He was one of the lucky among the abandoned kids of wartime Korea. The three GI's had found him alone and uncared for in a land too swept by the disaster of strife to take care of parentless children.

They were glad, and yet their hearts hurt, as they looked for the last time at the small human miracle they had wrought.

"We picked him up in a railroad yard about 3 weeks ago," said the first father, Sgt. John Braman, of Green Bay, Wis. "All he had on was an undershirt and a bunch of rags."

"He had filthy sores all over him," said the second prideful father, Corp. David A. Said, of Belen, N. Mex. "Bet you can't find a sore on him now. Just look at him."

"He brushes his teeth now," said the third father, Corp. Arthur Densmore, of Wilder, Vt. The other two listened respectfully. They agreed that although Densmore is a quiet fellow he had done the most for our boy.

When they had heard about the evacuation of Korean orphans, the three GI's inquired of the chaplain who was organizing it. He told them honestly the boy would be safer with the others. They were worried that if things get worse they couldn't take care of him. So here they stood, still unreconciled to giving him up, taking snapshots of their boy until the plane door closed and carried him out of their lives.

"We call him Syngman Rhee—after the President of Korea—because he said his name was Rhee," said the first daddy. The second one stuffed a big wad of money in the pocket of their child. Corporal Densmore, the quiet one, said nothing. He clicked his camera. I don't think he dared to look up.

A Korean interpreter called to the child in his own language. "Dont forget to brush your teeth."

Tiny "Syngman" Rhee bowed three times to his American parents—one of whom is only 18 years old. He smiled uncertainly.

"What else must I do?"

This was translated. The three men looked the other way. Young men hate to have their tears seen.

"It's better this way," muttered one. "He will be with kids his own age. We were just spoiling him anyway."

"Yeah," growled another. "We might have to pull out and leave him, crying at the end of the runway."

Corporal Densmore still said nothing. He kept staring into his camera and clicking the shutter.

The big transport wheeled out. The fathers started walking off. They turned to look at the plane just once. Then they kept on walking, one reaching down to pick up two stones. He beat them together in his hand as he walked.

The "Defeat" That Means Victory

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GLENN R. DAVIS
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I set forth herewith a thoughtful and thought-provoking article by David Lawrence which appeared in the December 22 issue of United States News and World Report. I believe my colleagues will find it helpful at this critical time.

THE "DEFEAT" THAT MEANS VICTORY
(By David Lawrence)

We have been reversed on the field of battle in Korea. We have left behind under the white crosses some of the bravest men of our times.

They have died in a great cause. They have aroused a disillusioned world to the sad fact that hypocrisy instead of sincerity has permeated the policies of certain countries which usually profess Christian attitudes. Alas, from governments pledged under the sacred Charter of the United Nations to uphold law and justice and to resist aggression has come now a craven desire to abandon principle to expediency. This is a worse defeat than we have suffered on the battlefield. For it means a compromise with evil, a willingness to offer up the whole population of South Korea to massacre, to admit that the crime of aggression does pay.

Let us go back to the fateful days of last June, when an aggressor army crossed the thirty-eighth parallel in Korea to invade and attack. The United Nations resolutely declared that our Armed Forces must be mobilized to resist the aggressor. A mission of enforcement was given to General MacArthur—to defeat the aggressor and to liberate all of Korea.

Now it turns out that certain member nations didn't mean what they said. It is revealed that, all during the time that General MacArthur was pressing northward, he was being urged through diplomatic channels—and through sniping dispatches from Europe—not to antagonize the enemy, not to liberate Korea, not to use all the force at his command to achieve a military objective. He was supposed to hesitate somewhere along the way, first at the thirty-eighth parallel perhaps, and then somewhere in North Korea. He was supposed to pause while the politicians of the UN waited to hear the faithless words of the Soviet and Chinese Communists as they were asked to withdraw and pledge themselves to accept UN rule in all Korea. The plea was broadcast. It was defiantly rejected by the Communists.

Instead, the Communist radio warned periodically that MacArthur must not cross the thirty-eighth parallel with his forces and that all foreign troops must leave Korea at once. Some UN members behave now as if these warnings should have been heeded—that MacArthur should have ceased to regard himself as a military commander and should have moved his troops north only with the permission of the aggressors. In reality, our friends in the UN are saying that MacArthur should never have endeavored to complete his mission, which was to liberate all of Korea.

Certainly MacArthur's knowledge of what was happening in a military sense in the north was inadequate. The enemy which was concentrated across the Manchurian border didn't send him word of what was being planned. Should MacArthur, therefore, have refused to test out the enemy's intentions? Would the UN really have been satisfied to halt its forces of liberation indefinitely at the waist of Korea in manifest fear that the Soviet-Chinese Communist alliance might possibly attack us if we ever attempted to finish the assigned task?

General MacArthur had a right to proceed to the Yalu River to complete his mission. His orders, however, prevented him from sending planes to reconnoiter above the Chinese border. When Chinese "volunteers" arrived in North Korea in huge numbers as early as October 19, Communist China had forfeited any right to immunity from either attack or reconnaissance. We had a right on that very date to bomb the bases of supply of the enemy in Manchuria. General MacArthur has described the restrictions imposed on his freedom of action as an enormous handicap without precedent in military history.

Again and again on the battlefield there must be an offensive to probe an enemy position. General MacArthur's advance was a huge maneuver attended with grave risks. It was a maneuver of detection. The revelations which flowed from it reached far beyond the battle zone itself. Most important of all is the detection of a real weakness among the UN member governments themselves.

We are back to 1936, when Britain and France equivocated and the League of Nations faltered as Hitler committed his aggression 'n the Rhineland.

We are back to vacillation and timidity—to fears of loss of commerce and unwillingness to face resolutely the facts of international life. We are at the low point where immorality breaks the promises that men are supposed to live by.

Like the bolt at Pearl Harbor, our defeat in Korea may turn out to be the stimulus to victory. It will alert the American people and all defenders of principle and morality in the world. For it has revealed where hypocrisy reigns and where morality survives. It has exposed the irresoluteness of our allies in a critical hour. Our troops in Korea have made a painful sacrifice, but they have stirred the conscience of the world—the forerunner of a victory for truth.

Martin Gorski

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SAM HOBBS
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 8, 1950

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, Martin Gorski was a gentleman and a scholar. With his passing the Committee on the Judiciary and the House lost one of its valued and valuable Members. When he was elected to the Seventy-eighth Congress in 1942, we who had the honor of serving as members of the Subcommittee on Bankruptcy investigated his record carefully before we would accept him as one of our members, for that subcommittee must have not only experts in that field but also men who are hardworking and who will assume and perform their duties studiously.

That investigation was bipartisan. We consulted the bench and bar of Chicago, as well as the bar associations of the city and county. We found that he had served as master in chancery of the Superior Court of Cook County, Ill., for some 14 years. In that most responsible branch of the court's work he had to do with equity receiverships which are cases in the State courts most nearly analogous to bankruptcies. His record had been not only spotless but his attention to duty and dispatch of business were remarkable. The bar associations of which he was an honored member, certified that he was there held in high esteem, both for his friendliness and high character.

We had the pleasure of working with him in the intimacy of the Committee on the Judiciary including the Subcommittee on Bankruptcy during the entire time of his service in Congress, until he left us, having been called by his Maker to higher service.

He won the affectionate regard of each of his colleagues soon after he began his work with us and he increased that regard with every month of his service. It was a privilege to know him and to work with him and enjoy his friendship.

Let's Get Out of Korea, Stay Out of Europe, Bring Our Boys Home, Build Up Our Own Defenses, and Save America From Destruction—Speech of Hon. Joseph P. Kennedy, Former United States Ambassador to Great Britain

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday, December 21, I inserted in the RECORD a speech of former President Herbert Hoover which I hope that every American will read.

Today I am inserting a speech of another great American, Hon. Joseph P. Kennedy, our former Ambassador to Great Britain, which was delivered before the University of Virginia Law School on December 12. I hope every Member of both Houses, as well as every other American, will take the time to read it.

If we will follow the sage advice of these two great Americans, we can save our country from disaster and make of it the richest, most prosperous, and most powerful nation the world has even seen.

Mr. Kennedy's address reads as follows:

Lincoln in his famous Springfield speech said: "If we could first know where we are, and whether we are tending, we could better judge what to do, and how to do it."

It seems to me wise to see where we have come from VJ-day and where we are now. The objectives before us at that time were (1) to work out a just peace, (2) to create means for the preservation of peace, (3) to assist in the rehabilitation of a devastated world. In moving toward those objectives, we assumed in 1945 that they were common to all the Allied Nations. We learned in a short time that this was not the case, but that in communism a force was at work which was intent on dominating Europe and Asia for its own ends. Our problem since that time has been how to deal with this drive of communism.

As far back as March 18, 1946, I set forth in Life magazine what I considered should be the fundamentals of American policy. The first and foremost of these was that we should make and keep ourselves strong. Fundamental to any successful dealing with the world, was the maintenance here in the United States of a high standard of living. Whatever concrete actions might be suggested, to bankrupt this Nation in the pursuit of them, would mean our self-destruction. I was not against generosity—generosity within our means. I supported, for example, our initial $3,000,000,000 loan to Britain. I went further than that. I said in the New York Times of March 4, 1946: "Financial aid to the United Kingdom • • • is and should be an outright gift." But from the start I had no patience with a policy—what has become known as the Truman doctrine—that, without due regard to our resources—human and material—would make commitments abroad that we could not fulfill. As Ambassador to London in 1939, I had seen the folly of this when the British made their commitment to Poland—that they could not fulfill and have not yet fulfilled—a commitment that brought them into war.

I naturally opposed communism but I said, if portions of Europe or Asia wish to go communistic or even have communism thrust upon them, we cannot stop it. Instead we must make sure of our strength and be certain not to fritter it away in battles that could not be won.

But where are we now? Beginning with intervention in the Italian elections and financial and political aid to Greece and Turkey, we have expanded our political and financial programs on an almost unbelievably wide scale. Billions have been spent in the Marshall plan, further billions in the occupation of Berlin, Western Germany, and Japan. Military aid has been poured into Greece, Turkey, Iran, the nations of the North Atlantic Pact, French Indochina, and now in Korea we are fighting the fourth greatest war in our history.

What have we in return for this effort? Friends? We have far fewer friends than we had in 1945. In Europe they are still asking for our dollars but what kind of friendship have we bought there? Is Western Europe determined to preserve for itself those ideals of democracy that we have been preaching—our kind? Put to the test now as to whether she will arm herself effectively, even with our aid, to deal with the Russian threat, is she showing the kind of determination and the kind of will that amounts to anything? Plans for economic unification have fallen apart in the light of nationalistic differences. French military power is only a shadow of its former self, and a strong minority of Communist sympathizers keeps France in endless political turmoil. The military strength of Britain is one-fourth of what it was in 1946 and she shows every inclination to avoid the heavy burdens that would be involved in rebuilding it. West Germany, to date, has revealed no disposition to develop effective military strength. Italy is hopelessly ineffective and Greece can hardly police her own small territory. Where is there in all Europe any buffer against a massed Russian onslaught? Worse than this, where is there any determination to create such a buffer?

In the Middle East we have oil but no friends. Iran, Pakistan, even Egypt, seek neither our protection nor our influence. In the Far East, China, whose friendship with us seemed deep-seated and enduring, has a government which is now massing against us powerful armies and new vengeful hatreds. Indonesia, Malay, Indochina are in revolt or heavy with discontent at the influences we represent. India is showing signs of succumbing to influences other than ours, more indigenous and more palatable to her desires. In Korea we are spending thousands of American lives to accomplish an objective from which the sponsor—the UN—is retreating. Assume we stop the Reds somewhere across the belt of that peninsula, are we to continue fighting there indefinitely?

On the other side of the iron curtain are massed manpower and military strength of a type that the world has never seen. Divisions which total in the many hundreds and which we know are well equipped and have the capacity to fight, can be thrown into battle anywhere on that great land mass that stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They are backed by planes of high quality and great quantity. Russia's Navy includes a powerful fleet of submarines, many off the mainland of southeast Asia, and in all probability she, too, has the atomic bomb.

To engage these vast armies on the European or the Asian continent is foolhardy, but that is the direction toward which our policy has been tending.

That policy is suicidal. It has made us no foul weather friends. It has kept our armament scattered over the globe. It has picked one battlefield and threatens to pick others impossibly removed from our sources of supply. It has not contained communism. By our methods of opposition it has solidified communism, where otherwise communism might have bred within itself internal dissensions. Our policy today is politically and morally a bankrupt policy.

I can see no alternative other than having the courage to wash up this policy and start with the fundamentals I urged more than 5 years ago. It is absurd to believe that the United Nations can lead us out of this situation. The veto power alone makes it a hopeless instrumentality for world peace. The unwillingness of half the world to want world peace makes impossible effective organization to impose any such peace. In short, our chief source of reliance must be ourselves and we cannot sacrifice ourselves to save those who do not seem to wish to save themselves.

A first step in the pursuit of this policy is to get out of Korea—indeed, to get out of every point in Asia which we do not plan realistically to hold in our own defense. Such a policy means that in the Pacific we will pick our own battlegrounds if we are forced to fight and not have them determined by political and ideological considerations that have no relationship to our own defense.

The next step in pursuit of this policy is to apply the same principle to Europe. Today it is idle to talk of being able to hold the line of the Elbe or the line of the Rhine. Why should we waste valuable resources in making such an attempt? If the weakened European nations wish to hold that line and demonstrate a determination to do so, it may be that we can afford them some help. But to pour arms and men into a quixotic military adventure makes no sense whatever. What have we gained by staying in Berlin? Everyone knows we can be pushed out the moment the Russians choose to push us out. Isn't it better to get out now and use the resources, that would otherwise be sacrificed, at a point that counts?

The billions that we have squandered on these enterprises could have been far more effectively used in this hemisphere and on the seas that surround it. Had we the defenses in Iceland today that one-hundredth of the money spent in Berlin could have built, we would have purchased safety with our money rather than added danger. We need defenses in this hemisphere, in Canada, in the Caribbean, and in Latin America. After all, these are our neighbors whose security is inevitably tied up with our own. We have no reason to believe that cooperation on their part will not be forthcoming, and we can and should insist upon it.

People will say, however, that this policy is appeasement and will not contain communism. Will our present policy contain it? Can we possibly contain Communist Russia, if she chooses to march, by a thin, far-flung battle line in the middle of Europe? The truth is that our only real hope is to keep Russia, if she chooses to march, on the other sides of the Atlantic and Pacific and make communism much too costly for her to try to cross the seas. It may be that Europe for a decade or a generation or more will turn communistic. But in doing so it may break of itself as a unified force. Communism still has to prove itself to its peoples as a government that will achieve for them a better way of living. The more people that it will have to govern the more necessary it becomes for those who govern to justify themselves to those being governed. The more peoples that are under its yoke the greater are the possibilities of revolt. Moreover, it seems certain that communism spread over Europe will not rest content with being governed by a handful of men in the Kremlin. French or Italian Communists will soon develop splinter organizations that will destroy the singleness that today characterizes Russian communism. Tito in Yugoslavia is already demonstrating this fact. Mao in China is not likely to take his orders too long from Stalin, especially when the only non-Asiatics left upon Asiatic soil to fight are the Russians.

As I said, this policy will be criticized as appeasement. No word is more mistakenly used. Is it appeasement to withdraw from unwise commitments, to arm yourself to the teeth, and to make clear just exactly how and for what you will fight? If it is wise in our interest not to make commitments that endanger our security, and this is appeasement, then I am for appeasement. I can recall only too well the precious time bought by Chamberlain at Munich. I applauded that purchase then, though not how it was squandered; I would applaud it today. Today, however, while we have avoided a Munich, we are coming perilously close to another Dunkerque. Personally, I should choose to escape the latter.

Finally, people will say this policy is turning our back on the United Nations. To this there are two answers. Firstly, we cannot bear substantially the whole burden of the United Nations. In Korea we have 9 times as many troops in the field as all the United Nations put together. We have suffered 90 times the number of casualties that all the other United Nations have suffered, excluding only the South Koreans. And note the billions that we have advanced these nations as against the help they are giving us in Korea. A recent compilation sets up a very impressive balance sheet.

UNITED KINGDOM

Aid received and allocated

Five billion eight hundred and sixty-one million dollars since the war and $30,387,- 000,000 during the war, plus $2,000,000,000 in 1951.

INDIA

Aid received and allocated

One hundred and sixty-three million dollars during war and $45,000,000 since.

Aid given in Korea

No troops, 1 field ambulance unit, 400,000 jute bags under negotiation.

This is a costly and staggering extravaganza in which we have wasted too much of our substance.

Secondly, we must recognize that the United Nations is not at present a vehicle to enforce peace. If half of the world does not wish it to operate in this fashion, as is true of Russia and China, it is idle to pretend that it can operate in that fashion. The United Nations still has a purpose for voluntary organization and as a forum in which to air international issues. Looking at the United Nations in that role, the admission of Red China or any nation presents wholly different issues than are presented if we look upon the United Nations as a type of governing body, with governing powers. But half of this world will never submit to dictation by the other half. The two can only agree to live next to each other because for one to absorb the other becomes too costly.

An attitude of realism such as this is, I submit, in accord with our historic traditions. We have never wanted a part of other people's scrapes. Today we have them and just why, nobody quite seems to know. What business is it of ours to support French colonial policy in Indochina or to achieve Mr. Syngman Rhee's concepts of democracy in Korea? Shall we now send the marines into the mountains of Tibet to keep the Dalai Lama on his throne? We can do well to mind our business and interfere only where somebody threatens our business and our homes.

The policy I suggest, moreover, gives us a chance economically to keep our heads above water. For years, I have argued the necessity for not burdening ourselves with unnecessary debts. There is no surer way to destroy the basis of American enterprise than to destroy the initiative of the men who make it. We will, of course, continue to have to pay and to pay heavily for our defense. But what have we now in hand for the billions that we have spent abroad? We can no longer afford this luxury; we dare not afford its consequences to our own security. Those who recall 1932 know too easily the dangers that can arise from within, when our own economic system fails to function. If we weaken it with lavish spending either on foreign nations or in foreign wars, we run the danger of precipitating another 1932 and of destroying the very system which we are trying to save.

An Atlas, whose back is bowed and whose hands are busy holding up the world, has no arms left to deal with his own defense. Increase his burdens and you will crush him, or attack him from behind and he cannot turn to defend himself. This is our present posture. It strangles our might. The suggestions I make would unleash our strength. They would, I am sure, give considerable pause to the strategists and planners of the Kremlin. They would—and I count this most—conserve American lives for American ends, not waste them in the freezing hills of Korea or on the battle-scarred plains of Western Germany.

New Deal, International Propagandists Still Assume To Guide Us

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, following their customary line of imputing a lack of knowledge, sound judgment, and loyalty to all who publicly express the belief that permitting United Nations to exercise the power of involving us in war—although United Nations has not, and apparently, in the future, will not, furnish the men or material to win a war—New Deal and internationally minded propagandists like Mellett, Tom Stokes, Marquis Childs, Drew Pearson, and others, are hard after all those who venture to question their judgment or conclusions.

The Washington Times-Herald of December 27 carried an editorial which called attention to some of this kind of propaganda. It reads as follows:

POLITICS MAKES STRANGE BEDFELLOWS

The propaganda on behalf of Mr. Truman's foreign policy has reached a new pitch of frenzy even as the jerry-built policy itself is falling apart, both at home and abroad. The administration's political speechmakers and its newspaper and radio organs keep telling a restive people to forget the leaking roof and the tottering foundations—that they ought to think themselves happy and snug.

THE KEPT PRESS IS OVERCOME

Applauding their propaganda while lurking discreetly in the background are the corruptionists who are making hundreds of millions of dollars out of the Marshall ECA plan, foreign military aid, and Allied grafts. They, too, continue to represent a fantastically reckless course as the best thing for everybody.

Public opinion has had to battle to make itself heard, but has overcome all resistance and has poured forth a flood of protest that has steadily mounted since the rejection of everything which Truman offered in the November election.

It wants none of the Truman foreign policy calling for the continuous expenditure of America's youth and wealth overseas. At home, it has turned thumbs down on the welfare state, the wanton dissipation of their earnings wrung from the people by the Federal spenders, and the centralization of power in the bureaucracy.

SENSE VERSUS NONSENSE

The policy that the people demand calls for the security and solvency of the United States before everything. They reject the idea that American strength be frittered away in Europe as it has been in Korea. They want the Military Establishment to stand on guard within defensible limits in this hemisphere and its island outposts.

They insist that America not be undermined from within by a prodigal expenditure of its wealth on world saving fantasies and on political stunts to buy up votes and souls in the name of a security that grows ever shakier as the inflation of the currency progresses.

It is the object of the propagandists and the corruptionists to convince the people, against their own good sense, that they really want none of the things for which they are crying, and that Mr. Truman and Secretary of State Acheson know best.

Thus, one newspaper uses the caption "Hoover's policy is deadly" to dispose editorially of the patriotically American ex-President who expressed with entire clarity the people's wishes on foreign policy.

A political commentator of the administration faith says that Mr. Truman has accepted the Republican challenge on foreign policy, implying that the overwhelming sentiment of the people is merely a bit of partisan sniping at an accepted national policy.

Marquis Childs, an inveterate New Deal horn blower, devotes himself to eulogizing John Foster Dulles, the kept Republican in the New Deal State Department, as if the only Republican worth listening to is one whom Acheson leads on a leash.

THE PENTAGON PROPAGANDA

The Pentagon propagandists, marshalled in offensive deployment by Tracy Voorhees, a Wall Street lawyer installed as Secretary of the Army, are working up a campaign in support of further involvement in Europe. Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall harangues a selected audience of industrial, farm, and union leaders on the theme that he can't trust the American people—that they don't seem to want to accept a perpetual garrison state.

He complains that they dismantle the armies after wars and aren't eager to support huge tax burdens year in and year out to maintain the administration's correctional role throughout the world. General Marshall seems to consider this a personal affront. Like Truman and Acheson, he knows best.

Senator DOUGLAS of Illinois has even gone to the ludicrous length of complaining that the press should not have published Truman's self-revealing letter threatening to punch a music critic who did not flatter the President's singing daughter. Senator DOUGLAS says that it disturbs "unity" to print communications in which Truman exposes his own instability and pathetic limitations.

THEY HEAR FROM HOME

Such are the bedfellows who are trying to induce the American people to ruin themselves in foreign adventures. The self-styled "liberals" in their antagonism to the Republic, appear to prefer any foreign government or any combination of foreign governments to our own. They work hand-in-hand with the corruptionists who are cashing in and with the politicians and political generals who rise as the rest of the Nation is prostrated.

They and their newspaper and radio organs soft-pedal Truman's corruption, his vote stealing, his incompetence. But all of these people are hearing from home.

Acheson may have heard from his spiritual home in England, but the Members of Congress have heard from American homes, except, possibly, those in the Hartford convention States and from Aaron Burr's adopted State of New York.

The will of the people will prevail, as it must if America is to be saved.

Fortunately, former President Herbert Hoover, evidently fearful of what might befall the Nation at the end of the road which the administration is following, spoke out. He called attention to the self-evident truth that we cannot, by armed might, force our thought, our ways, upon all the rest of the world, much of which wants none of either.

More recently, the senior member of the other body from Virginia has given utterance to another thought which millions of Americans have entertained for a long—long time. He said that it was time for us to get out of Korea.

Both those at the head of our Armed Forces and some in the State Department have told us that we did not need nor want Korea; that we could not by force hold Korea. Yet, Mr. Truman, by his orders, insofar as he could, committed us to world war III.

Only last night, a member of the other body representing Massachusetts, speaking to a Rotary Club in Boston, said that the United States "couldn't deliver" on its promise to "stop aggression at any place and at any time." He said, "In the future, we must get as strong as possible and as fast as possible." He criticized the "error of making big statements and big commitments without the strength to back them up," and added, "Take the UN, for instance. Where is its force when it comes time to stop aggression? The United States had to put up five-sixths of the UN forces finally. That was enough for Korea, but inadequate for the Chinese Reds. We have promised to stop aggression any place any time, but we can't deliver."

The Americans who, with their lives and their resources, will be required to pay for world war III, do not even know why they are called upon to fight that war. They do not know its purpose. They have no means of knowing whether they can win that war.

They do know that they are now called upon by the administration and the international propagandists to fight, some of them to die—all of them to participate in the cost of that war.

Today, as always, those who pay the least, are loudest in their demands that others do the fighting, the dying, the paying.

Stop Doling Out Dollars

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, more and more it is dawning upon the public mind that our economic lifeblood is being drained away by the internationalists who have for a long time been playing into the hands of the Communists.

The article which appears in the December 27 issue of the Pathfinder by Mr. Graham Patterson, its publisher, is directly in point. There is no evidence whatever that this Democratic-New Deal-Fair Deal administration is doing one thing to cut down nonessential Government expenditures at this time of our national crisis. Under leave to extend, I am inserting the article mentioned above, entitled "Stop Doling Out Dollars":

STOP DOLING OUT DOLLARS

The disastrous turn of events on the international scene has brought into sharper focus than ever before the vitally urgent need for every economy by our Government—and the wholehearted loyalty of every citizen.

Early this month, President Truman asked for $18,000,000,000 in additional appropriations, necessitated by our greatly magnified defense needs. We face a grim and costly future, for our defense expenditures will be steadily greater. Even without all-out war, America would of necessity have to make itself an armed camp, and with all possible speed. And it is apparent to everyone by this time that we will have to remain an armed camp—at a staggering cost—as long as Russia is ruled by its power-mad clique of aggressors.

Part of Russia's plan to conquer us is to bleed us dry economically, to make us waste our substance, until financial and economic chaos makes us a choice plum ripe for the plucking. Why, then, should we work in our enemy's interest by continuing unnecessary drains on our financial lifeblood?

It is time to forget socialistic plans, time to stop doling out dollars in handouts, time to stop the incredible waste of the taxpayers' money in governmental extravagance. Taxes are already discouragingly high.

The Tax Foundation of New York recently published a comprehensive review of governmental spending and taxation. It pointed out that welfare programs, modestly started under the goad of depression, paid out more than $5,500,000,000 in 1949, and indications are that greater amounts will be spent in the decade ahead. The programs were not condemned; the point raised was the danger in such expenditures when the people already are under a heavy tax load, and the combined Federal-State-local public debt has reached a frightening $281,000,000,000.

Today a complete overhauling of the grossly padded public payroll is a must. Several weeks ago, a special congressional subcommittee reported that investigation of the Treasury Department and part of the Labor Department disclosed gross overstaffing, falsified work reports, and dissipation of funds. It pointed out as an example of Government extravagance which prevails in obscure places that Coast Guard headquarters, a part of the Treasury Department, has eight admirals on its staff.

In the Bureau of Labor Statistics the committee reported that an appropriation of $1,000,000 intended to revise the Bureau's cost-of-living index was dissipated through "gross overstaffing, inferior planning, untrained supervision, and improvident administration. * * * Some employees were forced to falsify records by signing erroneous work progress reports" and those who demurred were threatened with punitive action.

One Bureau worker testified that he was told to appear busy in case officials appeared, and another said there were weeks at a time when there was no work to do in our office.

Such brazen mishandling of the public's funds is unforgivable at any time, but today it is akin to treason.

The Basis for Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Wall Street Journal of December 26, 1950:

THE BASIS FOR FOREIGN POLICY

What should be the basis for the foreign policy of the United States?

President Truman, in what has come to be known as the Truman doctrine, says that it should be the containment of communism, that this Nation should fight communism anywhere, and if necessary everywhere, that it threatens the peace.

Former President Herbert Hoover says that the foundation of our policy must be to preserve this Nation and the Western Hemisphere.

There is an important difference between these two points of view. That difference is now being openly and widely debated for the first time in a silent decade.

The two views need not, of course, conflict always or in every particular. To fight Communist power in particular places can be an essential part of our own defense. The defense of the Western Hemisphere does not preclude, and may require, fighting Soviet power outside the Western Hemisphere. The two viewpoints can converge.

There is, moreover, similarity of purpose in the two views. The advocates of containment everywhere advocate it to save America. The objective of the others is also to stop communism from engulfing the whole world, including ourselves. They are all honorable men.

Nevertheless, the difference is vital—not for what is intended but for what results.

The Truman doctrine begins by accepting United States responsibility for defending all parts of the world from Soviet encroachment; this becomes primary policy. In effect, the United States becomes a nation without differentiated frontiers. The frontier becomes one gigantic circle around Russia's present sphere. And since the doctrine is to defend that circle everywhere, the relative values of the various points on the circle become lost. All points become more or less of equal value.

The next progression, an unintended one, is that the responsibility of other peoples to defend themselves gradually becomes secondary.

Their self-defense is, of course, definitely desirable. But since containment everywhere is viewed as essential to our ultimate safety, we soon think we must defend other countries regardless of their own efforts. And the other countries soon begin to think they do us a favor to let us defend them.

At this stage decision becomes confused. Korea, let us say, cannot be weighed on any balance. It is a point on the circle; it is a part of the general responsibility we have assumed; and so we fight for it whether or not it has great value in terms of the larger fight.

So long as the policy is to contain everywhere, there is simply no standard to distinguish among Korea, Indochina, or the Rhine—all become Koreas if the Communists choose to make them so.

From this kind of thinking there is another progression—also unintended but also inevitable.

Unconsciously we begin to make the defense of this Nation a subordinate consideration in weighing any proposed action.

If the policy is to contain everywhere and there is a threat anywhere, what room is there to debate whether to fight this particular threat will strengthen or weaken our own defenses? Unless we are to abrogate the policy there is no choice but to fight the threat anywhere. Action is automatic. The United States has then no choice but to intervene in Korea, or any other place.

The Truman doctrine thus puts the defense of this Nation second in the minds of the men whose trust is the defense of this Nation.

With the defense of this Nation as the paramount policy all this is changed. From this premise the cost of any action would be measured against the gain; the risks of intervention in any Korea would be measured against the risks of abstention.

Men would still differ in judgment. They would still debate the intervention in Korea, the rearmament of Germany, the reinforcement of Europe. All these things would still be difficult matters to decide. Even from the Hoover premise men would differ on the Hoover proposals as to what is best or prudent in a particular place.

But in the debate men would have a common plane of reference—the safety and preservation of this country. There would then be something to measure against, there would be a standard for making value judgments, a balance on which to weigh military and political opinions.

The policy of containment leaves us no choices. By trying to contain everywhere we become vulnerable everywhere and we can be truly strong nowhere. In the name of saving the world this policy deprives us of the freedom to seek out what is best to save America.

The policy of putting the safety of this Nation first is the only one which offers us a way of wisely measuring our strength against the task—or, indeed, offers any way of measuring at all. Therefore, it, and not the policy of containment everywhere, ought to be paramount in the foreign policy of the United States.

It may be argued by honorable men that this reversal of emphasis ignores morality. For in its application there may come a time when the United States, measuring what is best for her own safety, may have to make the harsh decision of abandoning temporarily some cherished bastion. And the greater obligation, it is truly said, is to preserve the world from barbarism.

To this we can only reply that there is in the world today only one power that stands in the way of that barbarism. So long as the United States stands the way is barred. So soon as it falls the whole world will be engulfed.

It will profit neither ourselves nor civilization to risk the destruction of that power in the name of saving civilization. To pursue in the name of morality a course which weakens the power of the United States would be the true immorality.

A foreign policy which puts anything ahead of the preservation of this Nation betrays the Nation and civilization.

Text of Truman's Address

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper article appearing in the Boston Daily Globe of December 25, 1950:

TEXT OF TRUMAN'S ADDRESS

WASHINGTON, December 24.—Text of President Truman's address in connection with the national community Christmas tree ceremony today on the White House Grounds:

"All over our country and in many other parts of the world men, women, and children are preparing to celebrate the birthday of Christ.

"Never before in our lives has a Christmas seemed so important. I am not thinking of turkey dinners and stacks of gifts. I mean the quiet, reverent celebration of the faith, hope, and love—born in a manger in Bethlehem.

"Across all the continents of this world peace-loving people today feel apprehension and loneliness and fear.

"Many have forgotten the humble surroundings of the nativity and how, from a straw-littered stable, shone a light which for nearly 20 centuries has given men strength, comfort, and peace.

"At this Christmas time we should renew our faith in God. We celebrate the hour in which God came to man. It is fitting that we should turn to Him.

"Many of us are fortunate enough to celebrate Christmas at our own fireside.

"But there are many others who are away from their homes and loved ones on this day. Thousands of our boys are on the cold and dreary battlefield of Korea.

"But all of us—at home, at war, wherever we may be—are within reach of God's love and power. We all can pray. We all should pray.

"We should ask the fulfillment of God's will. We should ask for courage, wisdom, for the quietness of soul which comes alone to them who place their lives in His hands.

"We should pray for a peace which is the fruit of righteousness.

"The Nation already is in the midst of a crusade of prayer. On the last Sunday of the old year there will be special services devoted to a revival of faith.

"I call upon all of you to enlist in this common cause. I call upon you no matter what your spiritual allegiance.

"We all are joined in the fight against the tyranny of communism. Communism is godless. Democracy is the harvest of faith—faith in one's self, faith in one's neighbors, faith in God.

"Democracy's most powerful weapon is not a gun, tank, or bomb. It is faith—faith in the brotherhood and dignity of man under God.

"Let us pray at this Christmas time for the wisdom, the humility, and the courage to carry on in this faith."

Counsel of Despair

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 6, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the New York Times of December 22, 1950, is timely and apropos. Let us unite for victory—not political victory—but victory for all lovers of liberty.

COUNSEL OF DESPAIR

At a time when the United States is preparing at emergency pace against the danger of a new world war which would imperil our very existence as a free Nation it is right and proper for the American people and their spokesmen to reexamine our present policies and to scrutinize with an increased sense of responsibility the steps we are taking to cope with the situation. Unfortunately, however, in some quarters—particularly on the Republican side of Congress—this survey is being undertaken not only in a partisan spirit and amid personal recriminations, but also in what former Secretary of War Patterson calls an atmosphere of discouragement, despair, and defeat, betraying little faith in the potentialities of either the American people or the rest of the free world. Beginning with unbridled attacks on Secretary Acheson and the State Department in the tenor of "McCarthyism," part of the Republican leadership is now attempting to launch a fundamental revisionist movement which would destroy our bipartisan foreign policy, abandon the struggle for the preservation of the free world, surrender vast additional areas (including all of Continental Europe) to Communist domination, scuttle our alliances, and retire to a new isolationism based on the Western Hemisphere and a few oceanic bases, which, under such a policy, would not long remain on our side of the struggle.

Quite obviously this movement is a panicky shock reaction to the events in Korea. Under the impact of the United Nations reverses there and of the lukewarm attitude of the General Assembly toward Chinese Communist aggression, some Republican leaders would now abandon many of the measures for which they and a substantial majority of the Republican representation in Congress have voted. In doing so they, who are among the severest critics of Yalta, are willing to contemplate a course which could only lead to a super-Yalta that even Stalin could not have dreamed of at the time. If they have any doubt as to who would be the sole beneficiary of such a course they have only to study Communist propaganda, which is hewing along much the same line.

Neither the world political situation nor the military situation in Korea provides any warrant for such a policy. On the contrary, General MacArthur himself is compelled to inveigh against the artificial nuance of disaster that has been given to a military withdrawal in the face of overwhelming forces. And even if the United Nations forces should ultimately be driven out of Korea this would merely mean that the United Nations has lost the first battle, not the war. For that war is a war against aggression in which the main foe is outside Korea—a foe against whom ample reserves can be mobilized, if necessary, and on a better battleground. That war can be lost, however, by abject fear and by the surrender of both principle and the nations willing to fight for freedom by our side. We are confident that the American people will not deliberately invite such a catastrophe.

Possums: Dumb but Numerous

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article from the December 1950 issue of the Missouri Conservationist. This magazine is published by the Missouri Conservation Commission, Jefferson City, Mo.

POSSUMS: DUMB BUT NUMEROUS

(By Frank Sampson, game biologist, furbearer studies)

"An opossum hath an head like a swine, a taile like a rat, and is of the bigness of a cat. Under the belly she hath a bagge, wherein she lodgeth, carrieth, and sucketh her young."

Thus Capt. John Smith records the opossum as native in America in his 1612 description of Virginia.

The editor of this magazine says that the opossum is so well-known to the public that the public knows nothing about it. If this be true, it is about time that we take a closer look at this plodding little fellow who always comes through with the biggest share of Missouri's fur harvest.

In the harvest of possum pelts, as reported by the United States Fish and Wildlife Service, Missouri ranked at the top of all other States in the 1948–49 season, with 172,789 pelts sold. Arkansas ranked second with 115,920 pelts; Texas third with 91,461 pelts, and Illinois fourth with 79,505. So, for all his reputed laziness, the opossum does deserve a lot of credit even if he neither toils nor spins.

Although his hide isn't worth very much—about 30 cents last year—he provides Missouri fur hunters and trappers with nearly one-sixth of their fur income. With rising pelt prices, it is quite possible that his hide will be worth more this year. Besides his use for fur, his edible meat and sporting qualities make him a fairly popular little beast.

Probably opossums are best known for their so-called trick of pretending to be dead, or "playing possum," when cornered. Yet their well-advertised aversion to fast movement in escaping danger has also given them a reputation for being somewhat less than bright. However this may be, the opossum may not be such a slow-poke all the time. During the past 10 years this fellow has furnished Missouri fur-takers with as many of his pelts as all the rest of Missouri's fur bearers put together. For such a dull-appearing creature this is quite a contribution, and at least speaks well for his multiplication, if not his intellect.

When it comes to multiplying, the opossum gives the celebrated cottontail rabbit a run for her money. A mature female cottontail produces a yearly average of about 17 young in 4 litters. The labor-saving opossum may produce just as many or more young and does it with only 2 litters a year. Recent studies by biologists indicate that opossum litter sizes run from 5 to 14, with an average of about 9 young per litter.

In Missouri it is generally evident that the breeding season begins with mating about the first of February and ends with the weaning of the last litter the fore part of September. Although opossums are rarely given to rushing anything, they do have the shortest gestation period of any North American mammal—only 12½ days. However, this time is made up by the young suckling 6 to 8 weeks in the mother's pouch. And, speaking of pouches—the opossum is the only mammal in this country that raises its young in a pouch, similar to the kangaroo of Australia, which is related to the opossum. Both belong to the order of marsupials.

TWO HUNDRED AND SEVENTY TO THE OUNCE

At birth the young are quite undeveloped and for all practical purposes are still embryos. They weight 1/270 of an ounce each and are so small that a litter of 16 may be nicely accommodate in a tablespoon.

Immediately following birth the hairless, grublike youngsters squirm their way to the nipples in the mother's abdominal pouch by following a trail of milk trickling through the mother's hair. Once arrived in the pouch, formed by folds of skin on each side of the mammary glands, the young fasten onto the nipples (usually numbering 13), which become so swollen inside the youngsters' mouths that they cannot be shaken loose. Some 60 to 70 days later the young have developed hair and may occasionally venture outside the pouch. After a lapse of 90 days the young weigh around 8 ounces and are able to forage well for themselves. By the following February they are mature and ready to produce young of their own.

The adults weigh from 4 to 12 pounds, with males running slightly larger than females, and average about 2½ feet long from the nose to the tip of the tail. The tail, about 12½ inches long, is prehensile, another peculiarity of the opossum shared by no other North American mammal. This ability to wrap the tail around a limb and hang on undoubtedly comes in very handy to the tree-loving opossum. Other peculiarities possessed by the opossum, and found in no other wild mammal on this continent, include a grasping, clawless thumb on the hind foot and the most teeth, numbering 50 altogether.

Like most prolific animals, the opossum probably lives a relatively short time. Although he has been credited with a life span of as much as 8 years, some observers feel that his life in Missouri may be considerably shorter than this under wild conditions. In support of this view, they point out that immediately following a fairly severe winter many opossums are seen with goodly portions of their ears and tails frozen off. Yet in the fall practically all, if not all, opossums have ears and tails in whole and healthy shape. While opossums are known to investigators to be able to regenerate a certain amount of ear tissue lost through such mishaps as the pulling out of ear tags, it is doubtful they can regenerate all lost tissue to original condition or grow a good portion of a new tail.

The presence of opossum meat, probably mostly carrion, noted in several food-habits studies of the opossum, would seem to lend credence to this short-life theory. Such a postulation would indicate a possible life span in the wild that included only one severe winter.

THEY FORAGE IN DARKNESS

Seldom seen in daytime, this animal is a nocturnal prowler like many others of a predaceous nature., Although the 'possum—when he is not being chased—moves scarcely faster than a turtle, he does a lot of rambling around, especially on fairly warm, calm nights in autumn and winter when the moon or stars are shining. At such times he is foraging for food and may travel a circuitous route of 1 to 2 miles before sunrise.

Truly an omnivorous animal, the 'possum will eat practically anything edible. However, food-habits studies indicate that it prefers animal food material, particularly insects. It also consumes fruit and grains and includes in its diet such morsels as angleworms, snails, lizards, snakes, crayfish, slugs, and carrion from any kind of dead animal carcass it may find, including opossum carcasses. While it is commonly taken for granted that the 'possum is somewhat of a chicken thief, studies of its food indicate that this reputation is largely undeserved. Out of 68 Missouri 'possum stomachs taken over a 6-months period, only 3 percent of the total volume of food was found to be chicken, and only 0.2 percent consisted of chicken eggshells. At least some of this could have been carrion.

"For anybody as had any kind of dog, 'possum huntin' is made to order," says an old fellow down on the creek. According to him, "just any little old dog can make a passel of fun out of a 'possum or two—and you can't beat fun." Somewhat more discriminating dog men seem to take the view that a hound with no value for anything else makes a good 'possum dog. Most full-blooded hound dogs, some say, become stronger on 'coon or other game than on 'possums. Certainly there are plenty of mixed breed dogs—shepherd crosses, common farm canines and the like—that love to tree a 'possum. Some southerners favor a bulldog-hound cross, and it is generally conceded that a little hound blood mixed in a dog is to be desired, as it gives the dog a better nose and might even impart more music to his voice.

Running 'possums isn't much of a chore, as most folks know who have ever treed one. If the 'possums are there, they take up just about the nearest tree, and that is usually a sapling. If they tackle a big tree, they generally get themselves out on one of the lower limbs. Rarely do they run more than "half a quarter." This lack of enthusiasm for the chase is often interpreted as another shortcoming in intelligence. In fact, early observers branded the animal as a silly grinning idiot.

In the early 1900's, a naturalist measured the brain capacity of a 'possum skull by filling it with beans, to compare its equipment with that of a similar-sized raccoon. The opossum's wit-box held only 25 beans, while that of the raccoon measured 150 beanpower.

Those who harvest furs by trapping generally agree that the 'posum can get himself caught in almost any kind of trap set. Probably the majority of 'possum pelts are taken accidentally while trapping for more valuable furs. In his Lives of Game Animals, 1929, Ernest Thompson Seton writes:

THE MOST HELPLESS FOOL OF THE WOODS

"The 'possum is the most helpless fool of the woods * * * and when caught by some hard-gripping steel, it has not wits enough even to get mad; it simply looks bored, scared, and nonresistant. We find in this a melancholy proof that, in the struggle for life, wits count for less than fecundity—a complete, logical application of which principle warns us that Europe will be wiped out by Asia * * * and shall I add a sinister and disquieting thought? This world-winner is a pacifist." (Author's note.—That last sentence could be questioned today.)

Regardless of 'possum-inspired philosophy and of what it takes to catch him, from the numbers of furs sold it would appear that 'possums are somewhat easier to catch than muskrats and at least twice as easy as any other furbearer. At any rate, this seems to be the case for the past 10 years or so, during which time we have enjoyed a relatively high 'possum population.

More recently, however, during the past three seasons, the average take has fallen off about 48 percent from the average harvest for the previous 7 years. This might seem like we have been either harvesting too many or else 'possums are in a low period in their cycle. However, it should be considered that the past 3 years have also seen less activity on the part of fur-takers, due to low prices and due to a closed mink season in 1948–49.

Nevertheless, it is doubtful that reduced trapping activity would account for the entire reduction in 'possum take, which would indicate a lower available population. With the high reproductive potential possessed by 'possums, this is not as serious a matter as it is with low producers like the mink, who is also saddled with a high price on his head.

In comparison with the wearing qualities of other furs, the opossum does not rate very high, but is widely used in jackets, coats and trimming, and ranks among the first six species in importance as a furbearer. It has a durability rating of 37, as compared to a rating of 100 for otter, which is considered the most durable of all furs. Beaver rates at 85, raccoon 80, mink 75, striped skunk 50 to 75, muskrat 35 to 60, and rabbit 5.

SOME THOUGHTS ON EDIBILITY

When it comes to baked 'possum, some folks claim he's a gourmet's delight. Described as very palatable and delicious, the taste of his juicy meat is compared most often to being somewhat like pork, lamb, or mutton.

Refuge Supervisor George Quinn, sportsmen's chef par excellence, has divulged his recipe for preparing 'possum in a most toothsome manner. Says George: "First skin, clean, and trim off the surplus fat of your 'possum. Then parboil him about 1 to 1½ hours in a kettle of water to which have been added 1 pint of vinegar, one diced onion, and two chopped stalks of celery. When tender, take out and bake in oven until nicely browned. While browning, baste frequently with a sauce, mixed to taste, of melted butter, vinegar, sugar, salt, and pepper. Peeled sweet potatoes may be baked along with the 'possum or, if preferred, the sweet potatoes may be candied separately. Serve with barbecue sauce or baste with barbecue sauce on the last couple of bastings."

Doubtless it was while gorged with savory 'possum meat and sweet potatoes—producing a tranquility of mind matched only by the 'possum himself—that someone was inspired to compose the old southern Negro song:

" 'Possum am a cunnin' thing,
He rambles in de dark,
Nothin' 'tall disturb his mind
But to heah my houn' dog bark."

The Wrecking Crew

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the following column written by Thomas L. Stokes appeared in the New York World-Telegram and Sun of December 22, 1950. I hope its perusal will cause some of our colleagues to think twice before making reckless charges in the trying days ahead.

THE WRECKING CREW
(By Thomas L. Stokes)

WASHINGTON, December 22.—We pride ourselves on our freedoms—of speech, press, assembly, religion.

In our free-and-easy American way we have come to condone all sorts of reckless, irresponsible—often false and malicious—things that are said in our political campaigns. We even make jokes about it all.

But recent events suggest that perhaps the time has come to reexamine our light and cynical attitude.

Is it time that we exert a bit of self-discipline? The abuses of our blood-won privileges are by a minority and a small minority, which is evidence itself that most of our people exercise self-discipline.

To what noisome lengths such a minority is able to go in these critical times has been exhibited here in the dastardly attack on a patriotic, able woman, Anna M. Rosenberg. It would seem to indicate that the decent majority is lax in permitting ourselves to be misrepresented before the world by a wrecking crew of insidious defamers.

Senators of one of the now most important committees in this crisis—the Armed Services Committee—have been compelled to take nearly 2 weeks to conduct a sort of police court, listening to a lot of baseless insinuations from a strange panel of witnesses, including that type which now has become, with some people, a new sort of hero—ex-Communist.

Because of the important post to which Mrs. Rosenberg was appointed—Assistant Secretary of Defense in charge of manpower—the committee felt it must act to protect her. It is suggested that some better way might be found to go about it.

Mrs. Rosenberg has been cleared by a unanimous vote of the committee and the way opened for her confirmation. But the Anna Rosenberg case must not be closed. If we want to clear ourselves as a nation.

There is the obvious legal step of the committee in certifying some of the witnesses for the Justice Department for perjury, which is called for. But there is something much more fundamental. The Anna Rosenberg case was but a surface indication of a poisonous situation underneath. It revealed, by a link the committee discovered, something far more widespread that goes back to the last political campaign.

One witness, Benjamin Freedman, a retired businessman, testified he had bought for distribution 50,000 copies of a sheet called Common Sense aimed at Mrs. Rosenberg. This sheet also put out an issue attacking Senator BRIEN MCMAHON, Democrat, of Connecticut, chairman of the Atomic Energy Committee, which was circulated in his reelection campaign. This is just one item in a collection of such stuff distributed in many States which is being investigated by the Senate Privileges and Elections Subcommittee.

This subcommittee should not rest until it runs down the whole story, finds out who is responsible, and reports to Senate and Nation. Gerald L. K. Smith, we know, was mixed up in the attack on Mrs. Rosenberg. There are others involved in this noxious campaign of the last election.

Report of Hon. Sam Hobbs, of Alabama, to the Committee on the Judiciary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. FRANK WILSON
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report by the Honorable SAM HOBBS to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Report to those of my colleagues of the Committee on the Judiciary who did me the honor of authorizing me to appear as amicus curiae in the case of Henderson v. The United States of America, Interstate Commerce Commission, and Southern Railway Co. in the Supreme Court of the United States.

I did my best; and will always be grateful to each of you for the opportunity you gave me.

With fervent thanks!

SAM HOBBS.

IN RE CAUSE NO. 25, IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, ELMER W. HENDERSON, APPELLANT, V. THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO., APPELLEES, OCTOBER 11, 1949

We, the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, acting by and through the undersigned members, do hereby designate and authorize our distinguished colleague, the Honorable SAM HOBBS, from the State of Alabama, to appear as amicus curiae in the above entitled and numbered cause, and participate in the oral argument.

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, OCTOBER TERM, 1949, NO. 25, ELMER W. HENDERSON, APPELLANT, V. UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO., APPELLEES—BRIEF OF SAM HOBBS AS AMICUS CURIAE

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The law of this case is clearly and succinctly stated in the briefs for the Interstate Commerce Commission and for Southern Railway Co.

The Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives of the United States has never taken a contrary position; nor has the Congress or the Supreme Court of the United States.

The brief nominally filed for the United States is not a brief for that appellee and assumes the opposite position from that taken by those representing that appellee in the lower court.

This amicus curiae adopts the briefs of the attorneys for the other two appellees; and opposes the brief nominally filed for the United States.

QUESTION STATED

The sole question for decision on this appeal is whether or not the appellee carrier's rules regulating its dining-car service, which became effective March 1, 1946, requiring equal but separate accommodations for white and colored passengers, subject the appellant to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Appellant won his case in the lower court when he attacked a former rule of the carrier; so only the rules which became effective March 1, 1946, are attacked in this case and involved in this appeal.

Or, as stated in the brief for Southern Railway Co., on page 12, under the caption "The question presented for decision":

"The appeal brings to this Court for decision the question whether racial segregation of interstate passengers is forbidden by any provision of the Federal Constitution, the Interstate Commerce Act or any other act of Congress, so long as there is equality of treatment of those of different races. The question arises under the rule of the railway whereby the space in its dining cars is divided: one portion for the exclusive use of Negro passengers and the remaining part for the exclusive use of white passengers. It is the operation of the rule of the railway that gives rise to the question for decision; not the segregation statute of the State of Virginia in which State the incident here in question occurred."

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

It is respectfully submitted that the pertinent rules of the Southern Railway Co. are in accordance with the supreme law of the land as declared by the Supreme Court and the lower courts. Not only so, but those rules are wise, for the best interests of all the people affected, and in accord with the highest ethical standard.

The purpose of regulation is not utterly to prohibit. The Southern Railway Co., to all practical intents, operates only in that region where anything more than is required by the rules here under attack would render its attempt to operate its railway system absurd. To adopt the contention of appellant would be the kiss of death and render operation of the railway impossible.

These rules apply to all and should be obeyed by every passenger.

In Holy Writ we read: "Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." 1 Corinthians 8: 13. Why should not both white and colored passengers in interstate commerce be willing to rise to the height of that highest ethical standard? Why should any passenger be unwilling to give that much consideration to his fellow passengers?

The Constitution of the United States granted complete and exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce to the Congress. In the exercise of that power the Congress has repeatedly refused to require more than the rules in question indicate.

ARGUMENT

Judge Coleman, in writing the opinion of the majority in the lower court in this case, said:

"(1) Racial segregation of interstate passengers is not forbidden by any provision of the Federal Constitution, the Interstate Commerce Act, or any other act of Congress as long as there is no real inequality of treatment of those of different races. (2) Allotment of seats in interstate dining cars does not per se spell such inequality as long as such allotment, accompanied by equality of meal service is made and is kept proportionately fair. This necessity was recognized by the Commission in its report on which the order now approved by us is based, when it said (259 I. C. C. 73, at p. 76): 'Should the indicated trend continue, substantial equality of treatment may require the reservation of additional accommodations for Negroes in the future.' To the argument that proportionate allotment of tables is only just and equitable so long as persons may find seats at a table assigned to their respective races, and fails to meet the equality test when there is any empty seat in the dining car which a person of either race is forbidden to occupy, suffice it to say that this argument denies the very premise from which we start, namely, that racial segregation is not, per se, unconstitutional. Since this is true, we fail to see that a situation such as that just referred to produces a result any more unjust or inequitable from a legal approach —which must be this Court's approach to the question—than the no doubt common situation where both white and colored passengers may be kept waiting to secure seats at tables allotted to their respective races, because, for the time being, every seat in the dining car may be occupied.

"For the reasons herein set forth the complaint must be dismissed" (R. 260).

To the same effect is each of the six decisions cited and referred to in the index to this brief and in the Simmons case it is said:

"It must be repeated and steadily borne in mind that the power to regulate interstate commerce is vested in Congress. This power Congress has, within certain limits, delegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission. To what limits the powers of this latter body extend need not be inquired into. The fact remains that neither Congress nor any agency created by it has sought to impose any regulation dealing with the separation of passengers in interstate commerce. The fact that such separation has long been enforced in a number of States by custom and by the rules of common carriers operating in such States is a matter of public knowledge of which the Members of Congress are fully aware. In fact, although efforts have been made over some years to induce Congress to enact legislation on this subject, it has consistently refused to attempt such regulation. There can be no other inference than that Congress has thought it wise and proper that the matter should be left for determination to such reasonable rules as the carriers might themselves adopt and that it considered that rules providing for the segregation of passengers in those sections where they were applied were reasonable ones. By its refusal to nullify the practices and regulations of these carriers in respect to the separation of passengers, Congress has by the strongest implication given its approval to them. This is a field of congressional duty and responsibility. This court cannot invade it and, by usurping the powers of Congress, lay down rules by which this defendant must guide the operation of its business—rules which Congress, in the exercise of power specifically and solely entrusted to it, has refused to lay down." (Simmons v. Atlantic Greyhound Corp. (W. D. Va., decided Dec. 30, 1947, 75 F. Supp. 166).)

Fourteen times the House has voted against antisegregation proposals.

The views taken by the committee are amply borne out by speeches of Members of the House, as evidenced by their reproduction as appendix A of this brief.

The briefs for the Interstate Commerce Commission and Southern Railway Co. leave little to say. All pertinent cases, the Constitution, statutes, history of this case, and the rules made by the railway have been cited and quoted. To prolong this argument would be but repetitious.

But in behalf of the Congress, whose silence has been thunderous; whose counsel in the instant case has abandoned its defense and espoused the alleged cause of its adversary; for the Congress, to whom alone has been granted by the Constitution the power to regulate interstate travel; it must be said that the trust has been kept sacredly, and administered faithfully, for the best interests of all. The Congress confidently awaits the decision of this appeal, and the verdict of history.

CONCLUSION

I respectfully submit that this case should be affirmed.

Respectfully submitted,

SAM HOBBS,
Amicus Curiae.

ORAL ARGUMENT

May it please the Court: One in my position would be insensitive indeed were he not to feel deeply grateful to Your Honors for having granted leave to file a brief and participate in the oral argument of this cause as amicus curiae.

This amicus is keenly sensitive and deeply grateful to the members of the highest Court of Earth for the privilege of this great and joyful day.

However, he is well aware that his motion was granted because he had been directed to make it by 14 other members of the House Committee on the Judiciary, constituting not only a majority of the full committee but also majorities of each of the memberships of the two major political parties of whom the full committee is composed.

This case was to be heard originally in November 1949. Committee members were scattered—several in Europe on subcommittee duty—and because of the imminence of recessing no committee meetings were to be held, so there was no chance to have approval by full committee action.

The Committees on the Judiciary, as their names imply, are primarily charged with the duty of representing Congress as keepers of the springs from which flow the stream of administration of justice. So it is hard to conceive how strongly we members of these committees feel the terrible impact of the shock occasioned by the conduct of Philip B. Perlman, Solicitor General, who, with Herbert A. Bergson, Assistant Attorney General, Charles H. Weston and Philip Elman, Special Assistants to the Attorney General, signed what they called "Brief for the United States." In this brief, which they filed in this case, both on the front cover and on page 1, the words "Brief for the United States" appear in all capitals. The caption and first paragraph of the brief read as follows:

"IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES, OCTOBER TERM, 1949, NO. 25, ELMER W. HENDERSON, APPELLANT, V. THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION, AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO., ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF MARYLAND—BRIEF FOR THE UNITED STATES

"This proceeding was brought by appellant to set aside an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission. As required by statute, the United States was named as a defendant. The case is here on appeal from the judgment of the district court dismissing appellant's complaint, and the United States is a nominal appellee. Since the United States is of the view, however, that the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission is invalid, this brief sets forth the grounds upon which it is submitted that the judgment of the district court is erroneous and should be reversed."

On page 3 under the caption "Question presented" this appears:

"Whether the railroad's dining car regulations, approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, are unlawful because they subject passengers to discrimination and inequality of treatment, solely on grounds of race or color."

For 66 pages the brief goes on, seeking to justify the about-face the Department of Justice had executed upon reaching the Supreme Court, after helping to win the case in the trial court.

And now the Attorney General himself appears personally in the Supreme Court to participate in the oral argument for the only time that he has done so in any case since he has assumed the duties of Attorney General.

Nothing could be more in point than the remarks of Elihu Root in the Senate at the time of the passage of Urgent Deficiencies Act.

Senator Root, who was active in behalf of the bill was particularly explicit on this point. Senator Bristow, of Kansas, raised the question whether the Attorney General would be required to defend an order of the Commission if he believed that the order was not justified. The following colloquy ensued (Forty-fifth CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4104):

"Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will answer that without any hesitation or doubt. The Attorney General would be bound upon all and the highest considerations of his professional honor and his official duty to defend the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission in all courts having jurisdiction to review it.

"Mr. BRISTOW. Then he would not have any supervisory authority as to whether or not it should be defended?

"Mr. ROOT. Certainly not. It is his business to defend. He is no judge; he is no legislator; he is no reviewing authority."

The whole truth is—though probably I ought not so to state as we wish it were possible to get a clear-cut decision on the demerits of this moot case, or, as some contend on its merits—that if all who have no business here were excluded, the members of the Court would be left alone. Certainly the appellant would have to go, as the sole basis of his meritorious initial complaint was decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and again by three-judge trial court, in his favor, holding that the incident of which he complained did constitute discrimination against him, wherefore the rules of the railway were amended to comply with each decision and on the trial before the latest three-judge court, the latest rules of the carrier were approved, and the alleged case was dismissed. It is from that latest decision that this appeal is pending.

Certainly also, the counsel appearing for appellant have no more right than their client has to so appear; while the Attorney General and the Solicitor General have even less.

Again, certainly, this Court is not authorized to legislate; nor to oust the Congress to which was given by the Constitution the sole and complete power to regulate interstate commerce.

This litigation began by the filing of a complaint against the Southern Railway. That was filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Government took no part before the Commission. There is nothing in the Interstate Commerce Act or any other Federal statute that requires or even suggests that the Department of Justice should appear at that time.

The Commission approved the road's rule. It found discrimination in the way the dining-car steward applied the rule. It denied damages.

Appellant first sued in the United States Court of the District of Columbia. Being a resident of Baltimore, Md., he discovered his error, dismissed that suit, and refiled in the United States district court at Baltimore, docket No. 2455.

That suit was brought against the ICC and the United States.

Interstate Commerce Commission answered. The railway intervened and answered. The United States did not file an answer.

The three-judge court disagreed with the ICC because, as the court saw it, the rule did not provide for the Negro space to be assigned exclusively to the Negroes for the full duration of the meal.

The case went back to the Commission, the railway amended its rule making the assignment for that race exclusive for the full duration of the meal, and the ICC found the rule to be in accordance with the act of Congress and approved the same.

Appellant sued again in the United States district court at Baltimore, December 11, 1947, docket 3829. Again the suit was against the ICC and the United States.

An answer was filed for the United States on December 24, 1947, admitting the jurisdiction of the Court and the orders of the ICC which the United States alleged were made in due course of administrative procedure including full and fair hearings at which plaintiff had the opportunity to submit evidence and argument, and then further answered:

"Answering paragraphs 7 through 10, inclusive, defendant (United States) denies the allegations thereof and alleges that the Commission's said order of September 5, 1947, was duly made upon substantial evidence and in accordance with applicable law and was and is in all respects valid and lawful."

The answer concluded:

"Wherefore defendant (United States) prays that the relief prayed for by plaintiff be denied and that the complaint be dismissed."

After the plaintiff's attorney had been heard the defendants opened up with Mr. Dumbald, special assistant to the Attorney General (R. 26–29). He began by saying:

"I should say at the outset that I desire to treat the questions here in issue in this case solely upon the basis of existing law. I do not think the case should be decided upon any principles of moral philosophy or political evangelism or upon these basic doctrines of liberty and free association and the other things which very eloquently and very properly my adversary has rested his case on."

From the foregoing you will see the Department of Justice has changed its position back and forth, as follows:

First, it did not appear at all, which was its privilege.

Second, it did appear by answer and personal appearance before the Court in extensive argument in favor of the ICC's order.

Third, it abandons this position taken before the district court when the case reaches the Supreme Court on appeal. It now takes the position that the ICC's order was all wrong, that the Department of Justice in the trial court was all wrong, and that everyone is all wrong except it and its new associates.

Can anyone be so bold as to challenge the opinion of Senator Elihu Root that lawyers who accept employment from our Government to represent it are "bound upon all and the highest considerations of professional honor and official duty to defend the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission in all courts having jurisdiction to review it"?

The next point that I would make as strongly as I can is that in the Constitution of the United States a more perfect union was created and the Government of the United States therein set up was one composed of three coordinate branches—legislative, executive, and judicial. The first article of that Constitution, in section 8, paragraph 3, which specifies the powers granted to Congress, reads:

"To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

This has been repeatedly interpreted by decisions of this Court to be exclusive and complete, since there is no hint in the Constitution of the grant of any part of any such power to either of the other coordinate branches.

Therefore, with the utmost respect, may I insist that the Congress alone has the power to regulate interstate travel and to legislate with reference thereto. Unless necessary to an interpretation of the Constitution, this Court has no power to write or change legislation of that character.

Please permit me to stress my next point.

Separate but equal treatment is not discrimination. Only supersensitive persons, suffering from an inferiority complex, could so contend. Why should any normal person claim that he or his race is insulted, aggrieved, or branded as inferior, when one race is segregated as much as the other, and when exactly the same food, service, and prices apply to all, and exactly the same accommodations are reserved exclusively for his use, in the same car? In fact, the space reserved exclusively for Negroes by the 1946 rules of the Southern Railway—the only ones here at issue—was the choicest space in the dining cars, nearest the kitchen, assuring the hottest food and quickest service.

God created mankind with racial differentiations in color and physical characteristics, but up to the present time no one has accused the Creator of being offensive. He loves every one of His creatures. His creatures evidently approve of His handiwork, for almost every race has proudly claimed to be superior to all others and lived together in separate areas of their own choice.

Even nations have the same conceit. The Japanese fervently believe that they are the only children of their God.

And of course Germany claimed superiority with a vengeance: "Deutchland uber alles."

God must be also to blame for segregation, since in our Bible He is frequently quoted as ordering His chosen people, the Hebrews, who preserved for us the worship of Jehovah, to come out from among all other nations and be separate. He also, with one tribe, interdicted intermarriage, on pain of death.

Those who know most about the race problem agree with God (Abraham Lincoln, Booker T. Washington, George Washington Carver, Newton D. Baker, and a host of others). Both Booker T. Washington and George Washington Carver were my personal friends. I have heard them each speak on this subject many times. I had the honor of reporting the bill creating George Washington Carver Day. I know that each of those two great men also agreed with me fully on this subject.

The southern members of President Truman's Committee on Civil Rights, including Dr. Frank P. Graham, then president of the University of North Carolina, now a Member of the United States Senate, say (speaking as the minority):

"It dissents, however, from the majority's recommendation that the abolition of segregation be made a requirement, until the people of the States involved have themselves abolished the provisions in their State constitutions and laws which now require segregation." "To Secure These Rights" (pp. 166-167.)

In my written brief, which Your Honors granted me permission to file, in order to avoid duplication, I took the liberty of adopting the briefs filed by counsel for the Interstate Commerce Commission and Southern Railway Co. As those briefs cite all the pertinent decisions dealing with the issues involved on this appeal, I will not burden the Court by amplifying the arguments made in those briefs in this argument except to call the Court's attention again to the fact that in the Plessy case (which was decided in 1896) the only dissenting opinion was delivered by Justice Harlan, and he evidently had changed his mind materially by 1899, when he handed down the Court's unanimous opinion in Cumming v. Board of Education (175 U. S. 28), holding that race segregation under a State statute was not prohibited by the fourteenth amendment. However, in 1910, in the Chiles case, he again was the only dissenter, but this time he was content merely to use the one word "dissenting" and did not care to write another opinion.

And of course there are quite a number of decisions in State supreme courts of similar bearing.

Also I feel obliged to call attention to the fact that Judge Soper, the dissenting minority of the three-judge court that rendered the decision from which this appeal was taken, was the author of the decision in the case of Day v. Atlantic Greyhound Corporation (171 F. (2d) 59 (1948)), which opinion strongly supports the contentions of the appellees on this appeal.

Although the Interstate Commerce Commission found that the appellant had been discriminated against in the incident complained of, it held that there was no basis for an award of damages, as there was no proof of specific pecuniary loss, to which type of damages the Commission's authority is limited by law. This lack of authority to award damages for such injuries as were there complained of is sustained by the Supreme Court in the Case of Pennsylvania Ry. Co. v. International Coal Mining Company (230 U. S. 184, 203), and that holding was conceded by appellant in the first court action (R. 68).

The case at bar is ruled by decisions of this Court as stated most concisely in the brief of Southern Railway Co.:

"Hall v. DeCuir (95 U. S. 485 (1877)): DeCuir, a Negro woman, took passage from New Orleans, La., to Hermitage, La., on a river steamer operating from New Orleans, La., to Vicksburg, Miss. The master of the steamer refused to admit DeCuir to a cabin set aside for white persons. A statute of Louisiana recognized the right of common carriers of passengers to refuse admittance of persons to their vehicles provided such rules made no discrimination on account of race or color, and the statute gave a right of action to recover damages for violation of that proviso. Judgment in DeCuir's favor was affirmed in the State supreme court, but reversed in this Court. In the opinion Mr. Justice Waite said (p. 488):

"'We think it may safely be said that State legislation which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, does encroach upon the exclusive power of Congress. The statute now under consideration, in our opinion, occupies that position.'

"And added (p. 489):

"'No carrier of passengers can conduct his business with satisfaction to himself, or comfort to those employing him, if on one side of a State line his passengers, both white and colored, must be permitted to occupy the same cabin, and on the other be kept separate. Uniformity in the regulations by which he is to be governed from one end to the other of his route is a necessity in his business, and to secure it Congress, which is untrammeled by State lines, has been invested with the exclusive legislative power of determining what such regulations shall be.'

"From the foregoing it will be clearly seen that while the decision in the DeCuir case struck down the State statute as a burden upon interstate commerce, the over-all direct effect of the decision was to uphold the rule of the steamer whereunder the master, Benton, refused a Negro passenger access to the cabin set aside exclusively for white passengers. That the steamer's rule was thus upheld is made clear by the following statement (p. 490):

"'As was said by Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court in Welton v. The State of Missouri (91 U. S. 282), "inaction (by Congress) * * * is equivalent to a declaration that inter-State commerce shall remain free and untrammeled." Applying that principle to the circumstances of this case, congressional inaction left Benson (the master) at liberty to adopt such reasonable rules and regulations for the disposition of passengers upon his boat, while pursuing her voyage within Louisiana or without, as seemed to him most for the interest of all concerned.'

"In Plessy v. Ferguson, (163 U. S. 537 (1896)), another statute of Louisiana was before the Court. It declared that railways shall provide equal but separate accommodations for white and colored races, and further that a passenger failing to observe the segregation requirement might be fined or imprisoned. Plessy was a passenger between two stations within the State of Louisiana. He insisted upon occupying a seat in the coach set aside to accommodate white passengers. He was ejected and imprisoned. The Supreme Court of Louisiana affirmed his conviction. Ex parte Plessy (45 La. Ann. 80):

"On writ of error to this Court the constitutionality of the State act was attacked upon the ground that it was in conflict with the fourteenth amendment which prohibits certain restrictive legislation on the part of the States. This Court affirmed in an opinion by Mr. Justice Brown holding that the enforced separation of the races as applied to the internal commerce of the State neither abridges the privileges or immunities of the colored man, deprives him of his property without due process, nor denies him the equal protection of the laws within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. In that connection, Mr. Justice Brown said (pp. 544, 550, 551):

"'The object of the amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but in the nature of things it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation in places where they are liable to be brought into contact do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the State legislature in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children, which has been held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power even by courts of States where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced.

"'So far, then, as a conflict with the fourteenth amendment is concerned, the case reduces itself to the question whether the statute of Louisiana is a reasonable regulation, and with respect to this, there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature. In determining the question of reasonableness it is at liberty to act with reference to the established usages, customs, and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order.

"'* * * If the two races are to meet upon terms of social equality, it must be the result of natural affinities, a mutual appreciation of each other's merits, and a voluntary consent of individuals. As was said by the Court of Appeals of New York in People v. Gallagher (93 N. Y. 438, 448) "this end can neither be accomplished nor promoted by laws which conflict with the general sentiment of the community upon whom they are designed to operate. When the Government, therefore, has secured to each of its citizens equal rights before the law and equal opportunities for improvement and progress, it has accomplished the end for which it was organized and performed all of the functions respecting social advantages with which it is endowed."'

"Chiles v. Chesapeake & Ohio Railway (218 U. S. 71 (1910)): Chiles, a colored passenger on the C. & O. Railway, was traveling from Washington, D. C., to Lexington, Ky. At Ashland, Ky., he had to change to another train. Upon boarding it, he went into a car which, under the rules and regulations of defendant in error, was set apart exclusively for white persons. From this car he was required to remove to a car set apart exclusively for the transportation of colored persons. He sued in the State court for damages; judgment on a jury verdict for the defendant was affirmed by the Kentucky Court of Appeals. In an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice McKenna this court affirmed, from which opinion we quote (p. 74):

"'The complaint of the action of the court rests upon the contention that, as against an interstate passenger, the regulation of the company in providing different cars for the white and colored races is void. There is a statute of Kentucky which requires railroad companies to furnish separate coaches for white and colored passengers, but the court of appeals of the State put the statute out of consideration, declaring that it had no application to interstate trains, and defendant in error does not rest its defense upon that statute, but upon its rules and regulations. Plaintiff in error makes some effort to keep the statute in the case, and says that the trial court, by its ruling upon testimony and by its instructions, confined "the jury only to the lesser motive" of defendant's "wrongful act." In other words, as we understand plaintiff in error, confined the jury to the consideration of the regulations of the railroad company and withdrew from its consideration in the effect of the statute under which, it is said, the conductor declared he acted. But by this we understand plaintiff in error to illustrate that his rights as an interstate passenger were denied. We are, therefore, brought back to the question what his rights as such passenger were.

" 'The elements of that question have been considered and passed on in a number of cases. And we must keep in mind that we are not dealing with the law of a State attempting regulation of interstate commerce beyond its power to make. We are dealing with the act of a private person, to wit, the railroad company, and the distinction between State and interstate commerce we think is unimportant.'

"In reaching its conclusion to affirm, the opinion cited and quoted with approval from Hall v. DeCuir (95 U. S. 485), and Plessy v. Ferguson (163 U. S. 540), adding:

" 'Regulations which are induced by the general sentiment of the community for whom they are made and upon whom they operate, cannot be said to be unreasonable. See also Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. Company v. Kentucky (179 U. S. 388).'

"Morgan v. Virginia (328 U. S. 373 (1946)): Irene Morgan was a Negro interstate passenger on a common carrier bus in Virginia. The State statute required passenger motor vehicle carriers, both interstate and intrastate, to separate, without discrimination, white and colored passengers. Upon her refusal to accede to the request of the driver of the bus to remove to a back seat in the vehicle, partly occupied by other colored passengers, so as to permit the seat vacated to be used by a white passenger, she was arrested and convicted of violating the Virginia statute. Her conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia (184 Va. 24). On appeal, this court reversed in an opinion by Mr. Justice Reed holding that the Virginia statute was an undue burden on interstate commerce. In reaching this conclusion, he said (p. 381):

" 'On appellant's journey, this statute required that she sit in designated seats in Virginia. Changes in seat designation might be made "at any time" during the journey when "necessary or proper for the comfort and convenience of passengers." This occurred in this instance. Upon such change of designation, the statute authorizes the operator of the vehicle to require, as he did here, "any passenger to change his or her seat as it may be necessary or proper." An interstate passenger must if necessary repeatedly shift seats while moving in Virginia to meet the seating requirements of the changing passenger group. On arrival at the District of Columbia line, the appellant would have had freedom to occupy any available seat and so to the end of her journey.'

"The decision on this appeal did not turn on any rule of the motor common carrier; on the contrary Mr. Justice Reed was careful to point out in a footnote at page 377:

" 'When passing upon a rule of a carrier that required segregation of an interstate passenger, this Court said, "And we must keep in mind that we are not dealing with the law of a State attempting a regulation of interstate commerce beyond its power to make" (Chiles v. Chesapeake & Ohio R. Co. (218 U. S. 71, 75)).

"It is not amiss to stress the fact here that Mr. Justice Reed referred to Hall v. DeCuir (95 U. S. 485), and the soundness of this Court's decision therein (p. 383) and quoted at great length therefrom in a footnote at page 384.

"From the foregoing it will be seen that the decisions of this Court from 1877 to 1946 have uniformly upheld the principle of segregation of white and Negro passengers in common-carrier vehicles, equality of treatment being accorded both races, under appropriate rules of the common carriers."

The chief counsel appearing for appellant, Belford V. Lawson, Jr., has just argued, with tears in his voice, that if this Court should today fail to take the opportunity here afforded, it might be 7 years before they again might get back to this Court.

This is the same argument for immediacy which has been so often made.

All impatient reformers inveigh against "gradualism." They never approve of gradualism.

God does!

God built His universe and stockpiled the necessities for His creatures by gradualism.

"Do it now" is the theme song of every pressure group. But God took centuries to put coal and oil deposits into His Earth; years to make a man!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to leave granted me, I am including in my remarks an editorial printed in the San Francisco Chronicle on December 14, 1950, entitled as above.

This article was sent to me—and I assume to other Members of the Congress—by Mr. Paul C. Smith, editor of the Chronicle. I assume that it represents the thinking of Mr. Smith and members of his editorial staff. It is a powerful analysis of the security situation in which we now find ourselves. Not only does this article clearly point out the predicament we are in but also it suggests how this crisis might be met and solved.

Mr. Smith has earned his right to discuss these menacing problems, involving the very life of the Republic. In the recent war he joined the Navy and became a public relations officer. This did not satisfy his desire to serve his country in time of war. He resigned and enlisted in the Marines and experienced combat service. Some of his ideas and his attitude on the kind of a military posture which our country needs, if it is to survive the challenge now confronting it, were undoubtedly forged in the crucible of conflict when, as a marine, he was engaged in combat. The logic and reasoning in this editorial appeals to me. I commend it to my colleagues who will be called upon to help formulate the broad, strategic concept which we develop and execute to meet the Communist threat now facing the Nation.

This is the editorial:

BEDROCK FACTORS IN KOREA

We have the feeling that a great deal of pressure is building up, within the United Nations and elsewhere, to bring about a negotiated settlement in Korea that will represent, for our side, a compromise with principle and a resort to appeasement.

The idea has a certain appeal, of course. It will be embarrassing to have to pull out of Korea—people will say: "Look, the high and mighty United States has taken it on the chin." That's hard to swallow.

But there are some other things that would prove, in the long run, a great deal harder to take. It would be harder, for instance, to take a final defeat at the hands of the world Communist hierarchy—a defeat enabled by virtue of our having been suckered into an untenable position regarding Korea.

We believe that now is a good and an important time for the United States to try to bring the whole picture into perspective, and to get clear in its own mind what is fundamental and what is not. This newspaper has certain definite ideas on the matter:

We consider, first, that we are already engaged in what will prove to be an all-out, finish fight with Moscow-led communism. The prime objective of America in this fight is to contain communism, to drive it back, to draw its teeth, to expose it, and finally to eliminate it as a world force. This objective is the only one that will serve us under circumstances of an equivalent objective by the enemy. It's his survival or ours, and we are determined it will be ours.

WE ARE IN THE FIRST STAGE OF A LONG STRUGGLE

The shooting phase of this all-out struggle began on June 25. If this contest were a football game, we would still be in the first 2 or 3 minutes of play, with 57 or 58 minutes yet to go. To follow the same analogy, the other side has the ball and has us backed against our own goal line. But the main problem isn't how to prevent his making the first score. The main problem is how to marshal our strength and deploy our forces and outmaneuver the enemy so as to win the game.

A proper appraisal of the elements of that problem raises the question of whether, under any circumstances now conceivable, we ought to remain on the Korean Peninsula at all.

It is suggested in some Washington quarters that we cannot afford to leave the South Koreans with the sense that we have abandoned them. That is truly a grave consideration, but it must be balanced against the gravity of long-range military considerations. We are fortunate in having faced a similar situation in the Philippines—we said we would be back, and we were.

The question then is one of balance—of gaining a little face, perhaps, but of losing opportunity of incalculable value to us in this struggle.

First, as to the military side:

If a deal were worked out whereby we were permitted to remain in occupation of, say, South Korea below the thirty-eighth parallel, we would at the very minimum have to replace all of our troops now on the peninsula, to reequip them largely and, as a matter of fact, to increase our forces considerably in view of the new situation. With half a million Red Chinese sitting across the border, we couldn't settle for a half dozen divisions. We would have to muster a combination of power at least equivalent to the Chinese force, or run the constant risk of being pushed off at China's convenience. That's a costly operation, raising the question of whether it's worth it.

We are impressed with a whole battery of arguments that it is not.

The Korean war, and whatever war in Asia that the Korean war could lead us into, is bound to be primarily a manpower war. We are not in a position to win a manpower war in Asia, the turn of events in the Korean war has demonstrated that. We haven't the men, and such mechanized equipment as we have, or all we could amass, can't be used to good advantage. The great land masses of Asia are inaccessible to our incomparable Navy, and the terrain over which we should be forced to fight would cut any advantage in air power or motorized equipment to a minimum.

Besides, there could hardly be a more oblique and unrewarding approach to the heart of the Communist empire than across the bleak reaches of China and Siberia. Strong as we are, we could waste ourselves along that route to the point where Russia could whip us with ease.

CHINESE PRICE FOR A TRUCE SURE TO BE SKY HIGH

Furthermore, it is inconceivable that the Chinese Communists, feeling their oats as result of current limited successes, would drive exactly an easy bargain at the conference table. More likely they would say: "Give us Formosa; give us recognition; give us membership in the United Nations."

There's no appeasement involved in sticking to principle and conducting a fighting withdrawal, even if it means quitting Korea.

But there's appeasement—and nothing but appeasement—in knuckling under to Stalin's Chinese puppets in this kind of horse trade.

There was nothing dishonorable in our retreat down the Bataan Peninsula, even in our final surrender. But there would have been something abysmally dishonorable in our saying to the Japanese: "If you'll just leave us alone, we'll give you the Philippines." That's appeasement.

We suggest that the thing for us to tell Communist China at this time, in answer to any horse-trade proposal, is that we will hold China responsible for conforming to the principles of civilized nations and will insist upon her ultimate summary rejection of those principles notoriously espoused by the Communist international conspiracy.

We suggest that the United States make crystal clear to China that we do not accept either the capacity or the right of China to dictate the order of Asia or the Pacific basin, either alone or in conspiratorial association with the Soviet Union. Specifically, we reject emphatically the right of Communist China to occupy all or any part of Korea, or to dictate what American policy shall be as to Formosa, or any other region of the Far East. In short, we should reject any deal that involves selling out the interests of any people, large or small.

It is quite true that we can't make this position stick in terms of the immediate situation in Korea. It is quite likely that, having taken that position, we should then have to quit the Peninsula (and by "we" is meant, of course, those 100,000 hard-bitten, gallant soldiers and marines who have been defending our interests and our honor out there).

COMMON SENSE SHOULD MATCH OUR PHYSICAL POTENTIAL

But the process of quitting the peninsula would be part of the general process of seeking out a line from which we could more ably project our strength and assert our authority in behalf of peace and the rule of law.

We are not prepared to say where that line should be—certainly it would have to extend into Europe, and just as certainly it would have to have a firm base in the Far East. But it would follow that direction dictated by the long-range consideration of doing the whole job—of beating back the main Communist force, the Soviet Union, as the first order of business.

We are as sanguine as to America's capacity to succeed at this long-range job as we are doubtful of the sagacity of trying to keep our precarious foothold on Korea.

As we have suggested, this game is only in its opening minutes. Our great resources have not been tapped, and our weapons of greatest effectiveness have not been employed.

Our manpower is virtually intact. We still have our matchless industrial capacity, capable of turning out more goods in a month than the Soviet Union can produce in three or four. Steel, coal, oil, machine tools—these are the main materials of modern war, and we not only have them in great quantity, we have the knack of coordinating them and putting them to maximum use. If we wanted to buckle down to it, we could, in the course of time, clean up the Korea mess and roll Mao Tse-tung's forces all the way back to Peiping.

But that's what the big boss, Stalin, wants us to do.

That would use up our strength while he was saving his.

We are suggesting that we rally our common sense to match our physical potential; that we play this very earnest and deadly game as conservatively as we can; that we save our Sunday punch for the prime target; that we play to win.

University of Chicago—I

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BARRATT O'HARA
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I had intended before the completion of my service as a Member of the Eighty-first Congress to speak at some length and under a special order in reply to the remarks of my distinguished colleague and friend from Illinois [Mr. VELDE] on the subject of the University of Chicago. This week, however, while I have remained in Washington and have been in constant attendance at such sessions of the House as have been held and in giving attention to the work of my office until the expiration of my term, the circumstances of the holiday season have prevented the attendance of my colleague from Illinois, as well as many other Members, so that under an agreement by the majority and the minority leaderships Members have not been recognized for either 1 minute addresses or the privilege of the floor under special orders.

I am not quarreling with this arrangement, and certainly I would not wish to be understood as criticizing any man for spending the Christmas holidays with his family. We have been in session almost constantly during the entire year, and certainly Members have well earned the right of a few days at home during the Christmas season. I make mention of the circumstances obtaining only by way of explaining why what I shall have to say in answer to my colleague's remarks about the University of Chicago are inserted in the Appendix as an extension of my remarks.

The University of Chicago is in the district which I now have the honor to represent. John Gunther, in his book, Inside the U. S. A., says of the University of Chicago that "by any reckoning it is one of the three or four most outstanding universities in the world."

Edwin R. Embree, in Harper's magazine of March 1949, said:

A galaxy of Midwestern State universities—Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa—could scarcely have come to their great high standards without the compelling influence of the University of Chicago.

Should not I, or should not any representative honored by selection by the voters of the Second District of Illinois, feel a sense of pride that among the institutions in the home district was a university by any reckoning one of the three or four most outstanding in the world?

I admit that I have had such a pride, and that to the best of my ability I have sought to service with the facilities of my office the scholars and the students at that great school who have written me. I have thought that by so doing I was rendering my bit of service to the cause of education as well as performing the work that I undertook to do when I offered my candidacy to the voters. I have never lost sight of the fact that my State of Illinois was admitted to the Union only on the condition that forever she remain steadfast in her support of popular education. If in Illinois after her admission to the Union, on condition of her steadfast support of education, there had been built one of the three or four outstanding universities of the world, and that located in a district represented by me in the Congress, did I not have the right to feel in this Congress a pride that my State and my district had kept the faith with that far-away Congress that took us into the sisterhood of States on our pledge to promote education?

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I had on the walls of my rooms in the House Office Building a large framed photograph of the university and the university area, and facing it was another large photograph, one of a large blast furnace with a steelworker silhouetted against the glow of the flames. Those photographs meant something to me, and that something spelled pride in my country, where education and mechanical skill go side by side in the great work of making this a better world for all. I was proud that in my district were some of the best steelworkers in all the world and some of the outstanding scholars of the world, and I felt humble in the contemplation that I was their representative in the greatest deliberative body in the world in what truly may be called the capital of the world.

My assistant was a graduate of the University of Chicago, and one who had made education her life work. I thought that was proper and as it should be for one from a district where was located one of the three or four outstanding universities in the world and from a State dedicated by the terms of its admission to the Union to the cause of education.

I was proud, too, that on the Committee on Banking and Currency where I served were 3 out of 27 who came from the influence of the University of Chicago—the distinguished and beloved gentleman from Kansas [Mr. COLE], a graduate, and the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. WOODHOUSE], and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TALLE], who had taken graduate work there. I am very sure, having in mind the element of partisan fealty, that the zeal of my friend and colleague from Illinois [Mr. VELDE] would not carry him so far as to put the brand of Communist upon the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Iowa from the circumstances of past association and the danger of contamination. As to the gentlewoman from Connecticut, I am not so certain. She voted for rent control, for public housing, and for social security. That, combined with the circumstance that she did mingle for a few months as a graduate student on the campus of the University of Chicago, will probably damn her beyond any hope of successful defense at my hands.

Which reminds me that during the recent campaign a candidate appeared before a meeting of cultured and refined women in the area of the University of Chicago and when asked what was his definition of Communist, turned to the woman and said, "Do you believe in rent control?" and when she replied affirmatively, propounded the second question, "Do you believe in social security?" and then, when the answer again was affirmative, said, "Then you're a Communist."

So I am afraid the gentlewoman from Connecticut, with the horrible record of favoring rent control and social security as well as having spent a brief but dangerous period on the campus of the University of Chicago, cannot be saved by the likes of me, who is actually proud of a voting record similar to the gentlewoman's and who not only has a brother on the faculty of the University of Chicago but who is the father of three sons who attended not merely the university but its preparatory school, University High.

Since 1935 the university has been the target of, first, those who do not believe in education except for a privileged class on the theory that there will not continue to be a class of manual workers if all are permitted the advantages of higher education; second, those who do not believe in freedom of thought on the theory exploded by Thomas Jefferson that the masses were better off if the few did the thinking and the many did the work; and, third, those, well intentioned and discarding completely the fallacious theories of the first two groups, nevertheless were carried away, through misinformation and appeals to emotions and passions and prejudices.

The investigation of the University of Chicago which my colleague [Mr. VELDE] has stated will be carried on under the authority of the Eighty-second Congress can properly be no concern of mine since I shall cease to be a Member of this body with the adjournment of the Eighty-first Congress. Nevertheless, most of my colleagues will remain here as Members of the Eighty-second Congress, and I think it owing to them to give them at this time such information as I possess on the University of Chicago that later they can place proper evaluations.

Laird Bell is the chairman of the board of trustees of the University of Chicago. The standing of Mr. Bell in our community of Chicago as a citizen of the first quality is so well established that no one has even dared to challenge it. I doubt if Mr. VELDE, in recognition of the fact that the Chicago Daily News gave endorsement to his reelection, as well as that of other Republicans, will question Mr. Bell's standing and his loyalty.

When Mr. Bell speaks for the university it is with the endorsement of a board composed of some of the most distinguished businessmen and public leaders in the Nation. Would my colleague from Illinois say that these men, included among whom is such a one as Paul G. Hoffman, are either themselves Communists or so soft that they permit through inadvertence or intention the breeding of disloyalty in an institution of learning under their responsibility?

Here is the full list of the members of the board of directors of the University of Chicago, with the business connection of each member listed after his name:

THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

Laird Bell, chairman; Bell, Boyd, Marshall, and Lloyd.

Edward L. Ryerson, first vice chairman; chairman of the board, Inland Steel Co.

Herbert P. Simmermann, second vice chairman, chairman, executive committee, R. R. Donnelley & Sons Co.

Graham Aldis, Aldis & Co.

Charles F. Axelson, Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co.

Joseph C. Beaven, president, Standard Milling Co.

William Benton, chairman of the board, Encyclopedia Britannica.

William McCormick Blair, William Blair & Co.

Edward Eagle Brown, chairman of the board, First National Bank of Chicago.

Gaylord Connelley, executive vice president, R. R. Donnelley & Sons Co.

James H. Douglas, Jr., Gardner, Carton, and Douglas.

Cyrus S. Eaton, Otis & Co.

Marshall Field, publisher, Chicago Sun-Times.

Howard Goodman, vice president, Goodman Manufacturing Co.

Arthur B. Hall, Hall & Ellis.

Paul V. Harper, Sidley, Austin, Burgess, & Harper.

Paul G. Hoffman, Administrator, Economic Cooperation Administration.

Robert M. Hutchins, chancelor, the University of Chicago.

Fowler B. McConnell, president, Sears, Roebuck & Co.

Frank McNair, director, Harris Trust and Savings Bank.

John Nuveen, Jr., John Nuveen & Co.

Walter P. Paepcke, chairman of the board, Container Corp. of America.

Ernest E. Quantrell, investment banker.

Clarence B. Randall, Inland Steel Co.

David Rockefeller, second vice president, Chase National Bank.

Paul S. Russell, president, Harris Trust and Savings Bank.

Albert W. Sherer, vice president, McCann-Erickson, Inc.

David B. Stern, chairman of the board of A. G. Becker & Co.

John A. Stevenson, president, Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co.

Frank L. Sulzberger, president, Enterprise Paint Manufacturing Co.

Harold H. Swift, chairman of the board, Swift & Co.

Henry F. Tenney, Tenney, Sherman, Rogers & Guthrie.

Robert E. Wilson, chairman of the board, Standard Oil Co. of Indiana.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the members of the board of directors of the University of Chicago, who gave their approval of and endorsement to a statement by Laird Bell, chairman, when another attempt was made in the general assembly of Illinois to hit at the bulwarks of popular education by attempting to destroy a university in Illinois internationally recognized as one of the three or four outstanding universities of the world. Chairman Bell's article, approved of and endorsed by the full board of directors listed above, I shall include in another extension of my remarks.

University of Chicago—II

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. BARRATT O'HARA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at a time when the destruction or the impairment, certainly the embarrassment, of one of the three or four outstanding universities of the world, and one located in the district which I represent, has been threatened, or at least suggested, by a speech on the floor of this House I think my colleagues who remain over in the Eighty-second Congress will find timely these excerpts from a statement by Laird Bell, chairman of the board of directors of the University of Chicago, when a similar attack upon the university was made in the General Assembly of Illinois. If any of my colleagues wish to know the standing of Mr. Bell I suggest that they communicate with the publisher of the Chicago Daily News. If they wish to know what kind of men approved of and endorsed the statement of Mr. Bell I suggest that they consult the list of members of the board of trustees of the University of Chicago which I have included in a previous extension of my remarks.

Excerpts from Mr. Bell's statement of April 11, 1949, follow:

ARE WE AFRAID OF FREEDOM?

A serious question is raised by an investigating committee of the Illinois Legislature. The question is fundamental to democracy. It underlies all scholarship and all thoughtful inquiry. Therefore, it underlies the very purpose of a great university. The question is this: In these troubled times are we afraid of freedom?

ONCE AGAIN

In 1935 the legislature of the State of Illinois empowered a committee to investigate alleged seditious activities at the University of Chicago. Charges were made. Damaging surmises were printed in the public press. The work of the university was interrupted. At the conclusion of the investigation the committee wrote in its report:

"Has the University of Chicago or any of its professors violated either the letter or the spirit of our laws? The answer to this question must be in the negative. * * * Nothing in the teachings or schedule of the school can be held to be subversive of our institutions or the advocation of the Communist form of government as a substitution for the present form of government of the United States." (Majority report issued by Senators Graham and Barbour, June 26, 1935.)

The committee cleared the university. But a university is dependent on the public's appraisal of its contribution, and harm had already been done. Even the generosity of Mr. Wallgren, who contributed $550,000 to the university after the investigation was closed, did not remove the impression created by the headline charges.

This year on March 1, 1949, a group of students from Illinois universities, including a number of students from the University of Chicago, traveled to Springfield to protest the five bills introduced into the State legislature by Senator Paul Broyles. This they had the right to do. If they were disorderly we disapprove of their conduct. Immediately following this student protest, House Joint Resolution 21 was passed calling for an investigation of the university and stating: "It appears that these students are being indoctrinated with communistic and other subversive theories contrary to our free systems of representative government." This resolution was passed within a few minutes, without customary hearing or referral to committee.

So, once again apparently the university is to be investigated. Once again statements harmful to the university's reputation have been made. We think that the people who have made these statements do not know the facts. Most of the statements are untrue. But the newspaper reader is likely to assume that where there's smoke there's fire. Therefore, this statement is being made. The truth does not lie somewhere between the allegations of irresponsible individuals and our statement of it. The facts spell the truth, and the truth is the opposite of the charges.

There is no Communist professor at the University of Chicago. There is no Communist indoctrination at the University of Chicago in any course or program in its curriculum.

* * * * *

Communism is a term which is used loosely by different people to mean different things. Not everyone who advocates change is a Communist. In times when there is fear of Communist infiltration many persons are afraid of any criticism of things as they are. There is a tendency at such times to put a "Red" label on anyone with whose opinions one may not agree. Universities have as much duty to defend the free expression of opinion within the bounds of legality as they have to prevent what is illegal. If such defense subjects the university to the harassment of a legislative investigation and to the possibility of inadequate or distorted reports of it, we shall nevertheless defend the university's principles with all the vigor we can command.

The trustees and administration of this university are against communism. They are against it because, among other reasons, it is contrary to our free tradition. Communism suppresses ideas. We oppose communism as we oppose all efforts to undermine our constitutionally guaranteed free speech, free press, and free assembly. We oppose communism because we believe in the tradition of individual freedom which men throughout the centuries have fought to preserve. This tradition has been stated by many men in many ways. A few of these statements follow:

John Milton, Areopagitica (1644): "Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties. * * * And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so truth be in the field, we do injuriously by licensing and prohibiting to misdoubt her strength. Let her and falsehood grapple; who ever knew truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter?"

Thomas Jefferson, first inaugural address (1801): "If there be any among us who wish to dissolve this Union, or change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed, as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it."

* * * * *

Woodrow Wilson, message to Congress (1919): "The only way to keep men from agitating against grievances is to remove the grievances. An unwillingness even to discuss these matters produces only dissatisfactions and gives comfort to the extreme elements in our country which endeavor to stir up disturbances in order to provoke governments to embark upon a course of retaliation and repression. The seed of revolution is repression."

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Abrams v. United States (1919): "But when men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas—that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market."

* * * * *

Charles Evans Hughes, letter to Speaker Sweet, of the New York State Legislature, reported in the New York Times, January 10, 1920: "If public officers or private citizens have any evidence that any individual or group of individuals are plotting revolution and seeking by violent measures to change our Government, let the evidence be laid before the proper authorities and swift action be taken for the protection of the community. Let every resource of inquiry, of pursuit, of prosecution be employed to ferret out and punish the guilty according to our laws. But I count it a most serious mistake to proceed, not against individuals charged with violation of law but against masses of our citizens combined for political action, by denying them the only resource of peaceful government—that is, action by the ballot box and through duly elected representatives in legislative bodies."

* * * * *

THE TRADITION CONTINUES

Opinions such as these are often unpopular, especially when they are spoken in times of stress. But they have been stated again and again by men who were not isolated thinkers but men of action. It is fortunate that in the midst of our present apprehensions and alarms America does not lack men of the courage to continue the democratic tradition.

ROBERT A. TAFT, The Battle Against Communism, address to the Executives Club of Milwaukee, May 8, 1948: "There has been a good deal of talk of outlawing the Communist Party. Of course, under our Constitution, we cannot and should not make it illegal for an American citizen to think communism or express his opinions as long as he does not advocate a violent overthrow of the Government. We cannot afford, if we are going to maintain freedom in this country, to violate the Constitution. We would be killing the very liberty which it is the purpose of our whole policy to preserve against totalitarian attack."

* * * * *

WHAT ABOUT SPIES?

Today, some men devoted to freedom are worried about spies. They would "get rid of all the Reds" to eliminate the possibility of espionage. We, too, are against spies. But not everyone who is called Red is a spy. And, more important, not all spies announce themselves as Reds. The danger, if any, does not exist with the noisy agitators. The University of Chicago is engaged in secret projects of vital importance to national defense. The university is under surveillance of professional investigators, agents of the FBI and of the military intelligence units. This, we think, is the way to look for spies. The general suppression of Reds is too simple, too amateurish to be effective. J. Edgar Hoover, head of the FBI, is against it.

THE ATOMIC BOMB

"The Italian navigator has landed in the New World, and the natives are friendly."

In this cryptic message, so legend has it, the news of Enrico Fermi's successful operation of the atomic "pile" under the grandstand of Stagg Field at the University of Chicago was flashed to Washington on December 2, 1942. It meant that the chain reaction worked, and the first unleashing of atomic energy was under control.

The chain reaction made possible the most terrible weapon in history. It created the greatest economic fact of our time. It opened up endless new vistas for scientific accomplishment.

The work on the atomic bomb took great scientists. It also took great courage. Had it failed, the university might have been charged with the most spectacular boondoggle of all time. Or without the adequate calculations and protections which its scientists provided, the university might have been responsible for blowing up the northern end of Illinois.

The chain reaction is in a sense only a symbol of the working of freedom in ideas. It is no accident that the world's leading scientists wish to work in the free atmosphere provided by a great university. Freedom is the necessary condition of learning and progress.

Its contribution to the successful production of the atomic bomb was but one facet of the university's wartime activity. Its alumni and its staff served valiantly. It provided numerous trained individuals for positions of grave responsibility. Its facilities were mobilized and its activities ranged from interpretation and training in Chinese dialects and the prediction of weather in the Arctic region to the development of numerous protective measures for Armed Forces personnel. The University of Chicago has been honored by the Secretary of War for "contributing materially to the successful conclusion of World War II."

THE MARKET PLACE OF FREE IDEAS

This university was founded and rose to international prominence under circumstances which are possible only in a free and democratic state. Free interchange of ideas, free research, and the right of its faculty members to engage without restraint in the activities dictated by their judgment and their conscience have been protected and encouraged. Out of this freedom have come the renowned contributions of this university to the humanities and to the physical sciences, the social sciences, and the biological sciences.

* * * * *

It was in an atmosphere of freedom that A. A. Michelson, earliest American physicist to win the Nobel prize, measured the diameter of a star for the first time; James H. Breasted, America's first professor of Egyptology, furthered the understanding and reconstruction of ancient society; Robert A. Millikan won the Nobel prize for measuring the charge of the electron; Edgar J. Goodspeed achieved the status of the Nation's foremost New Testament scholar; Arno Luckhardt discovered ethylene gas, used as an anesthetic in millions of operations; Frank Billings demonstrated that teeth and tonsils can be focal centers for the spread of infection; Arthur H. Compton won the Nobel prize for his pioneer work on X-rays; Charles Merriam rose to eminence as a scholar and teacher of American political thought; Arthur J. Dempster isolated uranium 235, the atomic explosive—these men and the host of their distinguished colleagues produced the achievements which have placed this university among the foremost in the world.

* * * * *

It is in that freedom that the men of the university work today to find a cure for cancer, to harness atomic energy for peaceful productive use, to widen our knowledge of the social, political, and cultural forces in all human experience, and to train the teachers, the scientists, the scholars, and the enlightened citizens of tomorrow. It is upon that freedom that the future promise of the university is dependent. As Norman Cousins, editor of the Saturday Review of Literature, wrote in an editorial:

"For it is that environment rather than any dogma that represents the real Chicago story. It is impossible to spend any time on the campus without sensing the vitality of true academic freedom—not the academic freedom which limits itself (instead of being limited from without) to stump speeches or political activity, but the academic freedom which Holmes used to call the open market place of ideas. The spirit of independence, particularly as it applies to research * * * gives Chicago both its dominant characteristics and its chief claim on the future."

To be great, a university must adhere to principle. It cannot shift with the winds of passing public opinion. Its work is frequently mystifying and frequently misunderstood. It must rely for its support upon a relatively small number of people who understand the important contributions it makes to the welfare of the community and the improvement of mankind; upon those who understand that academic freedom is important not because of its benefits to professors but because of its benefits to all of us.

Today our tradition of freedom is under attack. There are those who are afraid of freedom. We do not share these fears. The University of Chicago needs the support of those who believe as we do.

LAIRD BELL,
Chairman, the Board of Trustees,
the University of Chicago.

University of Chicago—III

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BARRATT O'HARA
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I trust, and I have confidence, that in the mind of my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. VELDE] is no lurking suspicion that the Catholic Church is in any way allied with or sympathetic toward Joe Stalin.

The Reverend Father Joseph D. Connerton is the chaplain and counselor of the Catholic students at the University of Chicago. This is what he had to say in a letter to President Colwell, of the university, dated March 25, 1949, when some in the General Assembly of Illinois were so carried away by zeal to do deeds calculated to win publicity and resultant applause that they hit upon the good old University of Chicago as the most convenient target:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 25, 1949.

President ERNEST C. COLWELL,
University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. COLWELL: The recent action of the State legislature ordering an investigation of the University of Chicago because of alleged Communist activities prompts me to write this letter.

I have acted in the capacity of chaplain and counselor of the Catholic students at the University of Chicago since the fall of 1941. Even before that date I had some familiarity with the university. From 1934 to 1937 I was assistant pastor in the Catholic parish in which the university is located. My pastoral duties brought me into contact with many of the students and several members of the staff of the university. I believe I am, therefore, in a position to be able to express an informed judgment about the university.

The accusation or impression that the University of Chicago is a communistic institution or teaches communistic doctrines is an extremely false one. Like any other university worthy of the name, it teaches what communistic doctrine is. But it does not attempt to inculcate or promote or encourage communism.

I know of no Communists on the teaching staff of the university and do not believe there are any. Since my arrival at the university in 1941, the number of Communist Party members among the student body has always been small—I would say never more than a handful. The number of students influenced to the point of becoming fellow travelers or joining a Communist-front organization has also been small. In other words, the amount of Communist activity among the student body of the University of Chicago is no more than occurs at many of the universities or colleges in our country and less than occurs at some. I'm afraid that some people have drawn the very conclusion that the Communists wanted drawn from their agitation and propaganda, namely: that they are stronger and more numerous than they actually are.

As to the delegation of University of Chicago students who visited the legislature at Springfield, one does not need at all to be a Communist or Communist sympathizer to be opposed to the Broyles bills. Many Catholics are apprehensive of these bills, alarmed at their sweeping abridgments of our normal American liberties. We older members of the community might rejoice that there are so many young Americans eager to preserve the freedoms traditionally associated with our American way of life and guaranteed us by the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the State of Illinois.

One of the chief reasons Americans ought to oppose communism is the fact that communism is a totalitarian form of government. A sincere American might easily see in the Broyles bills evidence of a drift toward totalitarianism in our country. I believe that the already existing legal means of guaranteeing the safety and permanence of our free institutions and democratic processes ought to be used wisely and courageously by our governmental executives. Unless and until these means prove inadequate, no further power should be put into the hands of the executives of our Government. And any such extension of power ought to be limited in scope and limited in time.

Communism is an organized movement of the godless; it will be overcome more surely by godliness than by laws. Communism is a moral cancer; it will be cured by moral means more surely than by legal. In the fight against communism the force of virtue and truth will outweigh the force of law. Civil laws can help; but we would make a grave mistake if we would place our complete and exclusive trust in the enactments of men written in a book.

As Pope Pius XII says: "It is only the sacred principles of religion that can moderate within the limits of reason the duties and rights of citizens, car consolidate the foundations of the state and make men's lives conform to the salutary norms of morality, restoring them to order and virtue." He then quotes words from pagan Rome's greatest orator: "High priests, you defend the city more securely by religion than by its surrounding walls" (Cicero, De Natura Deorum III. 40).

As a Catholic priest, I believe it is unnecessary to state that I have no sympathy with Communist doctrine. Neither am I in sympathy with the secularism characteristic of much of our higher education today. But I do believe that an undeserved stigma has been cast upon the University of Chicago by the action of the State legislature in ordering an investigation of the university for communistic activities.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH D. CONNERTON.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BARRATT O'HARA
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Canon Bernard Iddings Bell represents the Episcopal Church at the University of Chicago. He is the Episcopalian consultant on education and religion. I am sure that my distinguished colleague who has informed the House that the University of Chicago is a hotbed of communism will be interested to learn that Canon Bell, in a letter to President Colwell of the university, dated March 30, 1949, declared in the name of the Episcopal Church and in his own name, complete confidence in the university administration "to see to it that subversive activities against our Nation are given no chance to do harm."

Canon Bell's letter follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., March 30, 1949.

DR. ERNEST C. COLWELL,
President of the University of Chicago.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I write merely to tell you how unjust and unfortunate seems this present "investigation" into communism at the University of Chicago. I am an alumnus, as you know, class of 1907; for 42 years I have been cognizant of what is going on hereabouts; during the past 3½ years I have lived and moved and had my being in intimate touch with the quadrangles and with university personnel, faculty, research scholars, the press, the students. I know that, while there are a very few scholars among us who may occasionally give students an impression that they are intellectually "left of center," the University as a whole is not influenced by these persons who are regarded for the most part as what they are, amiable eccentrics. I know, too, that the tiny group of students who constitute the Communist club are more laughed at than anything else. The investigation, with its implication that there is un-American skullduggery going on around here, is too absurd for words.

No one can accuse me, on my record, of any pro-Russian leanings, nor the church I represent here as having the same. Let me say to you then, in the name of that church and in my own name, how entirely we have confidence in the administration to see to it that subversive activities against our Nation are given no chance to do harm.

Yours very sincerely,

BERNARD IDDINGS BELL.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BARRATT O'HARA
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Rabbi Maurice B. Pekarsky, of B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation at the University of Chicago, on March 31, 1949, addressed a letter to President Colwell, of the University of Chicago, which I commend to the reading of my colleagues as timely in view of the recent attack upon this floor of the University of Chicago as a breeding place for communism.

The letter of Rabbi Pekarsky follows:

B'NAI B'RITH HILLEL FOUNDATION
AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO,
Chicago, Ill., March 31, 1949.

President ERNEST C. COLWELL,
University of Chicago,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. COLWELL: I have followed with great concern the developments in the Illinois State Legislature calling for an investigation of Communist activities at the University of Chicago.

I am confident that the university will be able to meet the test of the investigating committee. But I am gravely concerned about the threat of such investigations, however patriotically motivated, to the freedom of instruction and discussion which is basic to the conception of a university, and to the atmosphere of freedom which is the indispensable prerequisite to the faith and practice of democracy.

During the 9 years of my association with students and faculty of the university, I have had the opportunity to learn something of the spirit and character of this school. It is of course absurd to label the university Communist or to suspect it even remotely of sympathy for communism. The fact that I often read and discuss Catholic doctrine hardly makes me a Catholic. Likewise, the study of communism, as an aspect of the political and economic thought and life in our time, is hardly identical with professing it. Only through an objective study of the forces which shape the political and economic life of nations can we hope to prepare our students to appreciate the peculiar blessings which are ours, and to confirm them in their faith in the democracy which is ours. The interaction of opinions and convictions, freedom of study and research, the right to petition our legislature—these are democratic rights, the rights of all American citizens—students and teachers included.

I am saddened by the dangers to our democratic institutions which the Broyles bill and the investigation committee represent. But I have faith in the university and in the legislature. Sooner or later the representatives of the people are bound to recognize that the preservation of democracy is quite inconsistent with actions threatening the institutions which are committed to its ideals and its method.

Sincerely yours.

Rabbi MAURICE B. PEKARSKY.

BAPTIST OFFICE,
CHAPEL HOUSE,
Chicago, Ill., March 23, 1949.

President ERNEST C. COLWELL,
University of Chicago,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. COLWELL: In the light of the forthcoming investigation of the University of Chicago by the State legislature, it is fitting that one who works in the atmosphere of the university and directly with its students should register his convictions regarding the university on this issue.

It is my sincere belief that the University of Chicago is doing one of the most effective educational jobs being done in America today. Part of its greatness is its encouragement of all varieties of opinion in its faculty and student body. In spite of this unfettered freedom to think individually about any and all matters, and its open toleration of a Communist club among its students, the university is surprisingly devoid of pro-Communist sentiment. This is a tribute not only to the university but to the soundness of the American democratic faith in the ability of every man to reason for himself and to choose well once he has been given the freedom to hear all sides of controversial issues.

The Broyles bill now pending before the State legislature represents a departure from the tradition of freedom of thought and expression which has been the genius of our democracy. They are more a tribute to the weakness of fear and hysteria to which frail humanity is yet subject than to the strength of that daring faith in man which has helped America to achieve more of the fruits of democratic living than any other nation on earth.

My experience with the students of the Univesity of Chicago in the informal and unguarded hours of voluntary group life during the past 2 years leads me to make two general observations about them: (1) There is a high degree of political and social awareness in the average student. This is something about which any university may rightly be proud. We, who are ministers to students here, like to feel that we are making some contribution toward this type of educational end. (2) In the midst of all this political and social concern, I have met only one pro-Communist student, and he was the head of the Communist club. Though he argues persuasively with his fellow students, he never aroused a mass conversion. It has always seemed to me to be better to allow a person with his convictions to argue openly for them and be refuted by the lack of response on the part of other students rather than to give his ideas the attractiveness of being considered dangerous by banishing their open expression.

I count it a privilege to be working with students in an atmosphere where they feel free to ask me all sorts of questions about communism as well as Christianity and know that my answers are given with the same freedom with which they raise their questions. In such an atmosphere, I feel that my work of securing Christian commitment proceeds by the Christian method of persuasion and not by the Communist method of excluding all alternatives. I hope that we can keep this kind of climate of opinion at the University of Chicago.

Sincerely,

RUSSELL BECKER,
University Baptist Pastor.

Are We Getting Too Hysteria-Minded To Preserve This Democracy?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. USHER L. BURDICK OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, if the war was going all right in Korea, the public would say, "That's right, go to it—we will back you to a point beyond the limit." But when the other side has scored on us the whole picture changes. The chorus starts, "Hang Acheson (who advised us to keep out of Korea), impeach the President," and then all together on the chorus, "Get out of Asia and stay out." Is that not a fair portrayal of the present situation?

This is hysteria, pure and simple—it is madness—it will help defeat this country sometime if kept up. When an individual is in a tough spot he rarely fails to get through if he keeps his head—if anyone or any nation loses its common sense, defeat is inevitable. If football teaches anything at all, it is coolness and courage. In that game if a player gets slugged in the eye, he can not leave the game to go home and tell his ma. No, sir; he sticks—takes all the other side can hand out—but his team wins.

I am a Republican, I did not vote for the giving away of billions to foreign countries to prepare them for their own protection. If all had voted my way, we would not be in Asia at all. I voted straight through on all of these schemes "No." Now the Republican papers are pounding the President unmercifully—"We should not be in the war. It was Truman who got us in—down with Truman—impeach the renegade."

Well, now. Let us keep our heads in this crisis. Truman could not have done anything that would involve us in war if Congress had not made the appropriations. The people's representatives voted for it, regardless of party. The Republican Members who supported Truman's policy cannot hide now behind the curtain while this condemnation is afoot. Who supported the President?—90 percent of the solid South Dixiecrats and all 95 percent of the eastern seaboard from Maine to Virginia, including Maryland; 95 percent of the solid west coast delegation; Tennessee, Arkansas, Missouri, a large section of Pennsylvania, a section of Ohio, a section of Illinois, Michigan.

What was left—some of the great Central West—but not all of that.

These peoples' representatives, fresh from their districts, voted with the President—Republicans. Did they support the President? Well, look at the record and you will be surprised what a following he had among the Republicans in Congress. A brain has not yet been created that can make a political issue of our involvement in Asia. Both parties are to blame—the people back home are to blame. Regardless of how we got there, we are at war, and we cannot win it—we cannot even begin to win it if we are now to charge each other and everyone else but ourselves for starting it, and spend our time pointing out the men who are supposed to have brought this situation about. I hope we are still Americans. I hope we put the future of our great country ahead of the future of any political party. Since we are in it, there is just one thing for a voter or a representative of this Government to do and that is "get in there and do your stuff to defend the United States of America." Just because we have lost the first round, do not throw in the towel and feebly murmur, "I am licked." That is not the spirit that made this democracy great—that is not the spirit that has made it possible for us to build the greatest liberty-loving nation on the earth.

If it becomes necessary to change our tactics—as to where we will fight the common enemy; how we can fight him best; the leading military and naval boards will know it and do it.

We forget too quickly our history. Let us turn over the musty pages of the War Between the States. We got licked twice at Bull Run and our Army beat it back across the Potomac in a panic. It was every man for himself and the Devil take the hindmost. Lee and Jackson and the Confederate Army jolted the North so hard that Lincoln and his Secretary of State, Seward, found themselves in a sea of criticism and hysteria. The newspapers demanded the ouster of Seward and the great Lincoln was caricatured as a weak, vacilating creature who should not be trusted to head this Government.

Lincoln stood firm, cool, and collected while this storm of criticism raged.

He kept his head—he kept his Secretary of State, and went about the job of winning the war. Up to that time, no Northern general could move without permission of Congress—McClelland had failed—all had failed as long as Congress directed the war. Lincoln saw we could not win the war that way—he picked out a great general—U. S. Grant, and interviewed him. Lincoln asked Grant to take command of the Northern forces—Grant responded that he would not take it at all if Congress was going to hamper him by orders and counter-orders—Lincoln's answer won the war. He said, in substance, "Grant, you take the command and take the orders from me. Under the Constitution I am the Commander in Chief of our forces, and I am going to exercise that duty. Go to it, and I will back you up."

We are in the same hysteria now, we want to hang Acheson and impeach Truman, in our mad-unthinking haze.

Remember what has taken place in this country before—and remember that cool heads lead the way to victory.

If Truman is wrong—if we never should have started our foreign policy to arm countries—the majority of Congress is just as wrong as the President—and I mean a great majority, too. The Democratic Members who voted with Truman cannot escape the blame; the Republican Members from a majority of the States cannot escape the blame. Maybe the President and the great majority of Congress was right, but we shall never find out if we do not get into this war effort in a united way. We will have plenty of time after the war is over to do the talking we are doing now.

Point 4 and the Path to Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARRATT O'HARA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I shall be leaving this House with the adjournment of the Eighty-first Congress. During my one term here I have voted for every measure that I thought was leading on the path to peace. I have voted against every measure that I thought was, while sincerely intentioned, capable of becoming a gesture toward war.

There have been three major wars in my active lifetime, and I do not want that to be the pattern of my country. It is not the pattern that we should wish to hold before the young mothers of our land. If we cannot live in peace, and contribute to making this a world of peace, as a people we have failed in the mission under our destiny.

Governments are but the instrumentalities to assist the gravitation of eternal justice upward toward the throne of God. My concept of the destiny of our country and the Government through which it speaks and acts, is leadership in our time in such assistance.

ALTGELD'S MEMORABLE ADDRESS

I have made use of some of the language of one of the greatest of the sons of Illinois, John Peter Altgeld. When the current of prejudice and of passion, of doubt and of unfounded suspicion, was running wild and violent he dared to stand against the current in his faith in the inherent goodness of men and women. He died impoverished and the causes in which he believed seemed crushed. It was a brief time before his death that he delivered his never-to-be-forgotten address at Joliet, Ill., in which he said:

> I am not discouraged. Things will right themselves. The pendulum swings one way and then the other. But the steady pull of gravitation is toward the center of the earth. Any structure must be plumb if it is to endure or the building will fall. So it is with nations. Wrongs may seem to triumph. Right may seem to be defeated. But the gravitation of eternal justice is upward toward the throne of God.

The present situation in world affairs, Mr. Speaker, will not be so terrifying to our people if those words spoken almost half a century ago by John Peter Altgeld form the basis of their faith in the destiny of our country:

> But the gravitation of eternal justice is upward toward the throne of God.

FAITH SWEETENS SACRIFICE

Faith in America—in her destiny to serve as an instrumentality in assisting the gravitation of eternal justice upward toward the throne of God—will dispel confusion. It will give sweetness to participation in the sacrifices ahead.

To fulfill our responsibility, and to remain secure while our plans are developing, we must be strong. That will require large expenditures, which it is prudent should be met on a pay-as-we-go basis. Taxes will be increasingly large and there will be a growing list of things we will have to go without.

If instead of confusion, wherein we quarreled with ourselves and with our neighbors, we have the quiet faith that all is for a purpose in the gravitation through our struggles of eternal justice upward toward the throne of God we will find in our sacrifices the thrill and glow of travelers ascending to the mountain's peak.

BURSTING OF TOMORROW'S SUN

I am not discouraged, Mr. Speaker, because in the darkness of the night I can vision the bursting of the sun on tomorrow's morning. If by our sacrifices we can buy 10 years of peace we will have reached safely another height in man's ever upward climb.

Discontent breeds in poverty, and it is to the eradication of unnecessary poverty that our country has dedicated herself. That is the great undertaking and the great adventure of our generation. It is part and parcel of our national destiny.

AN OLD AMERICAN PATTERN

There is nothing new and untried with which we are experimenting. All that we are doing is applying on a world scale something which worked in our own land.

Capital and know-how went inland from our seaboard and in the development of new areas made new markets for the products of the old areas. So now, when modern means of transportation have made the whole world closer knit than were the original States and the Territories, we are fitting this old tried and proved American pattern onto the body universe.

Our money, loaned on banker-approved security, and our know-how, under point 4, are building in the neglected regions of the earth the foundations for prosperous economies.

Give us 10 years of peace for the development of point 4 and the world-wide broadening of the markets for the products of our factories and there will come to our people a prosperity surpassing any they have ever known or of any of which they have ever dreamed.

If every section of our own United States were in this manner raised to some measure of affluence, benefiting all other sections and harming none, so can it be done on a world level.

WORLD DRIVE AGAINST POVERTY

It is the first time in all recorded history that a world drive has been made on the eradication of unnecessary poverty, with no element of exploitation or desire of territorial dominion.

Merely by helping other peoples to help themselves, through development of their own resources on money loaned by us and with the assistance of our technical knowledge, we broaden everywhere the horizons of human existence, raise everywhere the standards of living, remove the causes of discontent and of wars, and open to us rich markets where now there is only poverty.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the path to permanent peace. It is why I am not discouraged and in the darkness of the night vision the bursting of tomorrow's sun. It is on the road of America's destiny to world leadership, not for privilege, or for conquest, but as an instrumentality for the gravitation of eternal justice upward toward the throne of God.

NO PLACE FOR GLOOM

In the sacrifices that are ahead for all of us I see no place for gloom. We shall be walking not into the night, but out of the night and into the morning of a brighter day than any our old world has known. It is the one war blessed with the prayers of the mothers of all lands—a war not against a nation, but against a condition—the war to end unnecessary poverty and thus to bring into realization the centuries-long dream of permanent peace.

With faith and courage and with a smile we can face the sacrifices which are the price of the blessings in store for us when the march is ended and the morning has dawned. To us in our generation is given the privilege of being participants in one of the great epochal periods in the history of mankind.

BUYING 10 YEARS OF PEACE

But we must have 10 years of peace in which to build up the economies of neglected areas through the developments we are financing. We are attempting to buy this peace with the staggering appropriations we are making and shall continue to make to be so strong that no one would wish to take the calculated risk of engaging us in another major war.

It would be folly, of course, Mr. Speaker, to minimize the dangers that we face. Unfortunately, the confusion in the minds of men and women is not confined to those of our own country. Neither here nor in Europe nor in the Orient is there a clear understanding of our purpose and our objective. Among many of our own people, terrified by what seems to them international involvements that tax excessively and for uncertain purposes our resources, there is little, if any, conception of the richness ahead, the undreamed-of prosperity, if for but 10 years we can hold the lines for peace against an aggressor bent on world conquest. In other lands, spurred by the active propaganda of the Communists, among many people our point-4 program, intended to benefit ourselves only as first we build the prosperity of other peoples, is confused with the imperialism of a dead-and-gone age, an imperialism that forced the doctrine of race superiority and thrived on exploitation.

In the 10 years of peace we hope our sacrifices will buy, point 4 will prove itself to our satisfaction and to the equal satisfaction of all other peoples. In a world rid of unnecessary poverty, with the good things of life made available to the effort of all men everywhere, there can be no discontent to excite to conflict. The same program that developed the United States of America into the most prosperous nation in the world, with the highest living standard ever known, cannot fail in this larger test.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not be in the Eighty-second Congress, but back among my neighbors and my friends in the Second District of Illinois I shall continue to combat confusion and gloom, doubt and uncertainty, unfair discriminations and unfounded suspicions. I shall continue to believe in the inherent goodness of men and women. Even where my neighbor's thinking is not in agreement with my own, I shall not question his sincerity nor permit a difference of opinion to raise in my mind a doubt of the loyalty to country of my neighbor.

While we are marching out of the night, Mr. Speaker, as my humble contribution as one of the unofficial and unranked marchers I shall seek to cheer my neighbor with the vision of the day about to dawn and the brilliant bursting of the morning's sun.

A sense of the privilege of living and of sacrificing in one of the great epochal periods of history, when so intimately close to us will be the feel of the gravitation of eternal justice upward toward the throne of God, cannot fail to give to my neighbor and to me a spring to our steps and a glow to our hearts.

So, Mr. Speaker, may it be with my distinguished and beloved colleagues who remain behind, charged with the great responsibilities that will be given to the Eighty-second Congress.

Herbert Hoover's Advice on Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the splendid editorial appearing below was published in the Times-Star, Alameda, Calif.

Mr. William Werner, the owner and publisher of the Times-Star, has adopted a policy for this paper in keeping with the best traditions of the American newspaper.

It is independent in its politics and approaches the problems of the day with a critical penetrating scrutiny before adopting a policy toward them.

The editorial follows:

HERBERT HOOVER'S ADVICE ON EUROPE

The French have a saying which when they adhered to it won their country empires, and which, when they disregarded it, as in the last war, lost those empires for them.

It is "L'audace, l'audace, et toujours de l'audace." Very freely translated it means "Courage, courage, and always courage."

In listening to Herbert Hoover the night before last, we could not help but be reminded of it. For, though the former Chief Executive's talk was well delivered and well reasoned, it was not the talk which should have been given by the erstwhile leader of a young and vigorous nation.

Instead it was the counsel of an elder statesman in a country that was growing old. It was Byzantine. It was the sort of speech that one might have heard in Constantinople at a time when the hordes of barbarians were pushing in from the east to crush the remnant of the ancient empire of Rome which had moved to the Bosphorous to avoid yet other barbarians.

For like the Byzantines, he counseled a courageous defense of our empire; a waiting defense, a defense that does not lie in attack but rather in the dogged resistance of a people that can hope only to avoid the ultimate of disaster for a while, and not to crush the enemy permanently.

Hoover urged us to abandon all of Asia, with the exception of the islands of Japan and Formosa and some others, to the Communists, and to do likewise in Europe, leaving all its great resources of industry and manpower to be taken over by the enemy if they could not resist, which quite possibly they might not be able successfully to do unaided.

This policy of his could be attacked on a multitude of grounds, but today we shall content ourselves with only one—that of the spirit.

Have we, the people of the United States, so far lost our self-respect that we can let the lands of our ancestors be taken over by the Communists? Are we to let France, from which we have derived so much, fall into the hands of Russia; to let Italy, the seat of the Roman Catholic Church, come under the rule of the Kremlin; to let the British Isles be converted into nothing other than an outpost for our civilization? And all that without having first fought the invaders of those countries until we can fight no more?

We trust not. We believe not. For if we are to do that, then we shall have already thrown away our courage, and that done, with appalling swiftness we shall find ourselves so rotten within that we shall soon become a prey to the enemy from without—to the red specter of militant communism.

This must not happen to us. It is infinitely better for us to go to war for what we feel is right when that right thing is in danger than to wait for a better time. Had we done that when Hitler marched into Austria, or into Czechoslovakia, World War II would not have been fought. It would have been scotched too soon.

And in this present case, if we resolutely let it be known that we shall fight with all our strength on the invasion of western Europe, and do so when the time comes, we shall not regret it.

For our audacity will be that of a free, proud people, which is infinitely more than the courage of creatures who are driven up to the guns of the enemy in hordes for slaughter like so many cattle.

The AMA's Absurd Proposal for Training New Doctors

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, December 20, 1950

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, with permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I attach the following editorial from the December 27 issue of the Capital Times entitled "The AMA's Absurd Proposal for Training New Doctors":

THE AMA'S ABSURD PROPOSAL FOR TRAINING NEW DOCTORS

In its insensate opposition to any and all efforts of the Government to provide more adequate medical care in this Nation, the American Medical Association has been opposing legislation to give Federal aid to medical schools so that more doctors can be trained to meet the Nation's needs.

The medical schools, cramped for space and short of proper training facilities, have opposed the medical politicians because they realize the urgent need for Government assistance.

The AMA, which has fought every constructive measure to improve medical care, has come up with a plan of its own, which is nothing more or less than a rank fraud. It proposes to contribute $500,000 to help the medical schools out of their present plight.

This is about 1 percent of what was proposed in Government aid and only 1 percent of a minimum need. Some experts were convinced that even the proposed Government aid was inadequate. But the medical profession proposes to do this badly needed job with only $500,000.

It is obvious that the medical monopoly is not interested in training doctors, despite the widespread and well-recognized shortage of doctors. They are interested in keeping the supply well below the demand to protect their own economic interests.

The half-million proposed by the doctors is only half of what the AMA spent in propaganda in 1 month during the last campaign in their effort to kill the national health insurance program.

"Millions for politics and peanuts for health" should be the new slogan of the AMA.

It is obvious that the absurdly small amount proposed by the AMA to meet a major need is nothing more than a public-relations stunt dreamed up to offset the bad public reaction to the AMA's opposition to the Government proposal. Doubtlessly the idea was conceived by the AMA's high-pressure public-relations firm, Whitaker & Baxter, which is collecting fees in amounts substantial enough to help train a lot of new doctors.

Servicemen and Their Debts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. JOHN E. RANKIN

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I am including an article entitled "Servicemen and Their Debts," which appears in the January 1951 issue of the magazine Changing Times, published by the Kiplinger Washington Letter Service.

It is a very readable explanation of the provisions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act over which the Committee on Veterans' Affairs has jurisdiction. I believe that all Members of both Houses will be interested in this brief explanation of the workings of this law.

The article referred to follows:

SERVICEMEN AND THEIR DEBTS

Since leaving the Army in 1945, Bill Smith has acquired a family, a mortgage, some life insurance, and a sergeant's rating in the Reserve.

Facing the prospect of a call to active duty, Bill is worried. As a soldier he would get considerably less pay than now. How would his family manage to meet the mortgage payments and insurance premiums?

Would he have to lose the house, and let the insurance lapse?

Probably not. If worst comes to worst, Bill will almost certainly have his mortgage payments eased or postponed, and his insurance kept in force—thanks to a piece of legislation which is called the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act.

That act, in force during World War II and revived with the postwar draft, was designed to protect citizen-soldiers in exactly Bill Smith's position. As civilians, men take on civil liabilities. They sign leases, buy things on the installment plan, become liable for taxes, take out insurance, mortgage their homes. Then they get the nod from Uncle Sam. And the obligations that they were able to handle as civilians become impossible burdens on a soldier's or sailor's pay.

And so the Relief Act was put on the books to guarantee these men a fair shake. In effect, it empowers the courts and certain Government agencies to stall the enforcement of such liabilities, and to make whatever arrangements are necessary and justified to help the serviceman get off the hook.

If you or any of your family are in the service, or expect to be, or if anyone in the service owes you money or rents from you, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Civil Relief Act is something you should know about. A lot of cockeyed ideas are in circulation about it. Now is a good time to get straight just what it does and doesn't do. Here is how it would affect you, as a serviceman:

INSTALLMENT PURCHASES

What happens if you can't meet a payment?

The law applies if you or a dependent paid a deposit or installment before you entered the service, before you got orders to report for draft induction, or before you got orders to report for active duty from an enlisted reserve status.

The seller can't take back the property or merchandise or cancel the sale or take any other action against you without getting court approval first.

If the judge finds military service has impaired your ability to pay, he can postpone the proceedings until you've had a chance to catch up. He can make the seller give back what you've paid in before letting him repossess. Or he can work out any special arrangement—say, smaller payments over a longer period—that is fair to both sides.

MORTGAGES

What happens if the payments are too large for your service pay?

If you signed the mortgage before entering service, or before getting orders to report for induction or active duty, the lender can't foreclose without going to court.

The judge can order him to pay back what you have paid in and then let him foreclose. (That might well be the ruling if you had not yet acquired much equity in the house.) He can postpone enforcement of the contract or work out a new arrangement to satisfy you both. Or he can, in effect, declare a moratorium on payments while you are in service, provided you pay off the arrears afterward.

RENTS

You're off in the service and your family can't pay the rent. Can the landlord evict them?

Sooner or later, yes. But if your rent is $80 a month or less, here's what will happen: The landlord must go to court, no matter what agreement you may have made. The judge can then postpone the eviction for not more than 3 months to give your family time to find other quarters or pay up. He can have a rental allotment deducted from your service pay. Or he can make such other order as may be just.

There is protection for the landlord, too. While both collection and eviction are postponed, the landlord will be protected by the law in case any action is brought against him for failure to meet a mortgage or pay taxes.

LEASES

Before you enlisted or got orders to report, you signed a lease on some property. Can you break the lease?

As a rule, yes, provided you actually occupied the place, either for business or as a home. Write a letter to the landlord notifying him that you want to cancel the lease, and it will be terminated 30 days after the next rent payment is due.

The landlord has a chance, however, to get that rule modified. He can appeal to a court, and if the judge thinks that the abrupt cancelation is unjustified, he is authorized to change the arrangement around a bit—perhaps require that longer notice be given.

LIFE INSURANCE

Will your policies lapse if you can't pay the premiums?

You can ask the Veterans' Administration to keep up to $10,000 of your private life insurance in force while you're in service. If reduced income due to military service really is the cause of your trouble, the request will probably be granted.

The VA then keeps the policy in force by guaranteeing the insurance company that it will get its money eventually, in one way or another. The guaranty will run while you are in service and for 2 years afterward.

If the policy becomes payable while that guaranty is in force the insurance company will deduct the unpaid premiums, plus interest from the proceeds before paying off.

Otherwise, when the guaranty expires, the unpaid premiums become a policy loan, and you are expected to pay it off. If you don't, or if there isn't enough cash value in the policy to cover the loan, the policy will be surrendered, the VA will pay off the insurance company, and you will owe the Government the amount paid in your behalf.

TAXES

You owe some taxes when you go into service, or become liable for some while you are in. What happens if you can't pay?

On property taxes, the court can postpone a tax sale for up to 6 months after you are discharged. If, for any reason, the court does allow the property to be sold, you can redeem it at any time within 6 months after your discharge. This also applies to assessments.

On income taxes, the law flatly postpones the liability while you are in service and 6 months afterward. Then you must pay. Report your situation to the collector before the tax falls due.

Another section of the law says that no State or town can make you pay taxes to it just because you are stationed there on military orders. That covers automobile registration, too. You can keep your regular residence, for tax and car registration purposes, even though you are ordered to live somewhere else.

Those are the main provisions of the civil relief act, but there are many others. If you hold any kind of public-land right—a homestead entry, irrigation aid, a mining claim, or a Federal-land lease—some or all of your obligations to live on the land or work it can be suspended while you are in service. There are provisions protecting you in case any kind of lawsuit is brought against you while you are absent, and provisions protecting insurance policies given as security for a loan.

If you are a serviceman and get into any trouble with a landlord or creditor, you or your wife should check with the legal aid society. Its staff will explain your rights and help you protect them. On life insurance problems, get in touch with the nearest VA office.

And if you are the landlord or creditor in the case, be sure to see your lawyer before you start any action involving a serviceman.

In either case, remember that the law does not allow anyone to welsh on his debts. But it does guarantee that no civilian-turned soldier will suffer just because the Government forced him to take a pay cut.

Some Plain Talk About That Railroad Work Stoppage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial appeared in Labor under date of December 23, 1950.

This gives the other side of the recent railroad work stoppages. These stoppages were not authorized by any of the recognized railroad unions but came out of protest for the long delay in a justified upward wage adjustment.

SOME PLAIN TALK ABOUT THAT RAILROAD WORK STOPPAGE—STUBBORN MANAGEMENT STAYS IN DRIVER'S SEAT UNDER GOVERNMENT PAPER CONTROL

The mulish stubbornness of railroad management, and an unfortunate mistake by the Government, led to wildcat work stoppages for which no rail union was responsible. It is difficult to restrain men whose long patience has at last been exhausted.

Daily newspapers gave the public a one-sided picture of the situation, ruthlessly arousing prejudice against rail workers and their unions. Someone should tell the other side, and Labor proposes to do it here, as calmly as possible.

Way back in March, 1949, the conductors and trainmen asked the carriers for something which had already been granted to the million members of 15 nonoperating railroad unions, and which had already become common in other industries—a 40-hour week with no reduction in weekly pay. The two brotherhoods also requested correction of certain injustices in working rules.

It will soon be two full years since those requests were made. Since then, the engineers also asked for rules changes and long-overdue wage increases. The firemen and enginemen launched a move for the 40-hour week in November, 1949. Later they served notice for a wage increase.

All these reasonable and entirely legal requests have been dragging on for months, with the brotherhoods faithfully following the procedures of the Railway Labor Act, and incurring great expense in their efforts to serve the legitimate demands of their members. The unions even agreed to put aside their requests for rules changes, if that would expedite agreement on the wage issues.

Meanwhile, what do members of all the railroad unions see? They see workers in other industries getting wage boosts speedily, and without huge expenses to their unions. They, and their families, see the cost of living going up every day. They see the carriers piling up huge profits.

Now back to the oldest of the rail wage and rules cases, that of the conductors and trainmen. On August 25, 1950—more than a year and one-half after the two brotherhoods began their patient procedure—the Government seized the railroads to avert a strike by the members of the two unions.

The seizure consisted simply of announcing that an Army general was taking control of the railroads, but the same old stubborn managements were left in the driver's seat. They laughed at labor, figuring they now had the workers in a position where they could not strike. In other words, could not exercise their constitutional right to quit work.

If they did strike, they would be charged with striking against Uncle Sam and they would face court injunctions, as has now actually happened.

The Government, when it took control of the railroads, made the fatal mistake of not taking the responsibility which goes with control. If the Government had assumed responsibility for wages, working conditions, and profits, the smile would have been wiped off management's face.

Such real control has been tried by Government and it worked. Uncle Sam really took over the Toledo, Peoria & Western during the last war, when wild actions by the president of that road threatened a rail break-down. For 4 years the Government held the profits of the T., P. & W., and during that period the road had harmonious relations with its workers.

Likewise the Government really took control of Montgomery-Ward and the coal mines, and in both cases labor got fair treatment because management had to deal with workers on decent terms.

In contrast, the present Government seizure of the railroads left all the cards in the hands of management, and those cards have been played in a way to arouse the resentment of the railmen.

For weeks rail workers hoped that justice would come out of the White House meetings between representatives of the operating brotherhoods, rail management, the National Mediation Board, and Dr. John R. Steelman, assistant to the President. But Dr. Steelman, always smiling, always glad-handing, did a miserable job.

He put no visible pressure on the carriers. So management continued to sit in the driver's seat, with Uncle Sam not even acting as a back-seat driver.

Finally here and there groups of workers lost patience. They started unauthorized stoppages. Everyone, even the President, blamed the unions.

The unions were not responsible. They did their part. The Government failed to assume the responsibility which should accompany control. Managements thought the situation amusing and wouldn't yield an inch. That's the whole story.

Lobbying 1950—Direct and Indirect

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK BUCHANAN
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include an address which I delivered to the forty-sixth annual meeting of the American Political Science Association here in Washington on Thursday, December 28, 1950.

The address is as follows:

Madam Chairman, fellow panel members, members of the American Political Science Association, a speaker is always thankful when he has an audience that he knows is vitally interested in his subject. I know that you, as political scientists, are vitally interested in the subject of lobbying—what it is, what it means, the problems it raises, the means by which these problems can be attacked. You have shown your interest by the many hundreds of requests for hearings and reports which the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, of which I have the honor to be chairman, has received from students, teachers, and departments of political science all over the country. Your interest is further reflected in the countless suggestions and expressions of support which you have given our committee. My colleagues on the committee and I have deeply appreciated this response, and we have profited tremendously from it. You have been more aware of what our investigation has sought to do than any other group in the country.

This is, I suppose, as it should be. Lobbying is, after all, one of the great unsolved problems of American political science, and you should be professionally concerned with it. I, too, am professionally concerned with it. As you can guess, the problem of lobbying has been pretty much the star and center of my universe for the past year. The harsh and unavoidable fact is, however, that our enthusiasm is not generally shared. In 1949, for example, the American Institute of Public Opinion reported that fully 45 percent of its usual sample did not know what the term "lobbyist" meant. Furthermore, 60 percent of those polled either had no idea of what "lobbyist" meant or expressed no opinion as to whether or not lobbyists served a useful purpose or represented a bad influence on Congress. Of those expressing an opinion, only 15 percent thought that lobbying might be useful while 25 percent thought that it was bad. Assuming the general validity of these figures, they are a disheartening commentary on the prevailing level of public information about lobbying. I am personally convinced that lobbying can become—if it has not already become—a serious problem in our kind of democratic society. I am equally convinced that it is a problem which cannot be met successfully without a substantial increase in public interest and understanding. How to secure this interest and understanding is something else again.

The general lack of public information about lobbying was one of the great challenges which our committee has had to face. It was also one of the important reasons behind the establishment of our committee in 1949. During the 3 years following the end of the Second World War, there was more lobbying being done than at any previous time in our history. During this same period, the Regulation of Lobbying Act, designed to do nothing more than provide some rudimentary information about pressure-group activity, went into operation. Yet after 3 years of publicity under the Lobbying Act—and this in a period of extremely heavy pressure—almost half the public didn't know what a lobbyist was, to say nothing of who was doing the lobbying or how much it was costing, or whether it was desirable or dangerous. There had not been a major congressional investigation of lobbying since 1935. It was clearly time to strip away the ginger bread and take a long look at the system to see just what made it tick. This is, basically, what our committee has sought to do—without prejudice or emotion, and with as much thoroughness and insight as limitations of time, money, and personnel would permit.

As I look back on the committee's work in the past year, I am more and more impressed with the extraordinary complexity and range of the modern system of pressure politics. It is a system involving the efforts of many thousands of people and the expenditure of literally hundreds of millions of dollars. No single committee of Congress, however long it worked, could have laid the whole pattern bare.

While we do not begin to know all that there is to know about lobbying today, I sincerely believe that the past year's work has given us the basis for more systematic generalizations about the nature and implications of modern pressure politics than we have had in the past. This is my belief. You, as both students and teachers of political science, must render the final judgment on our efforts.

What kind of generalizations can we make about lobbying, 1950 style? I have already suggested one of the most important—that the sheer weight of lobbying activity has increased significantly in recent years. Members of Congress, the press, the lobbyists themselves can attest to this. During and after World War II, there were simply more groups organized to influence the course of government than ever before. Group demands on government have been more numerous, more insistent, better-financed, and more effective than ever before.

To my mind, a continuing increase in groups and in group resources is only a natural consequence of the development of a complex, highly organized industrial society. This may be an unattractive prospect in some respects, but there seems to be no way of avoiding it. But what is more significant than the simple fact of more pressure groups is, I believe, the radical changes which have occurred in pressure tactics. Lobbying has been revolutionized. Today's lobbying and that of 50 years ago have little in common.

Compare, for example, Lord Bryce's description of lobbying in the American Commonwealth with one of the admittedly less classic volumes of hearings held by our committee. In Bryce's day the lobbyist was a political freebooter, trading on his contacts and the marginal honesty of a few Members of Congress. He might be called a kind of primordial 5-percenter, but his activities bear little resemblance to modern pressure-group tactics. Where he fixed and bribed, the modern pressure group demands and threatens. While the old-time lobby baron spoke only for himself and his client, the modern group at least represents itself as the flexed legislative arm of thousands or perhaps millions of voting citizens; nor does the modern group merely represent the passive opinion of its members. It also seeks to shape this opinion, to use it as a means of pressure. Where the lobbying of two generations ago was essentially direct, making up in forthrightness what it lacked in honesty, the major emphasis these days is on indirection—on the use of large-scale public-relations campaigns rather than personal contact—public relations designed to stimulate broad public support for the group's aims. These campaigns feature such techniques as institutional advertising; boilerplating and canned editorials; the use of radio and television; exhortations to write, wire, and phone your Congressman; essay contests; public-opinion polls; and, above all, the distribution of unbelievable quantities of polemic literature of all and every kind.

One of the most significant features of this growing public-relations effort is that it is becoming increasingly long range in character. Not only do interested groups seek to influence public opinion on the issues of today and tomorrow but they are turning more and more of their attention to what they, at least, think will be the issues of 5, 10, or 20 years hence. Thus, the full-page ads which dwell moodily on the havoc an imaginary corps of Socialist planners is wreaking on what they usually call the American free-enterprise system. Not today, not tomorrow, perhaps, but we are left with little doubt that some kind of frightful Armageddon is inevitable.

These groups recognize that the issues of tomorrow will be decided by the mature opinions of today's youth; consequently, they make every possible effort to catch this opinion in the bud. The schools of the country have thus become a special target for long-range pressure politics. Free books embodying the group's views are distributed by thousands; teachers are hounded in numerous ways; and a watchful eye is kept on textbooks in such publications as the Educational Reviewer. The pressure groups have learned well the lessons taught by the public utilities in the twenties and thirties. Now as then, the long-run aim of these groups goes far beyond the conventional brand of lobbying; it is nothing less than the establishment of their views as the ultimate standards of orthodoxy, both in education and more generally. We have yet to see this attempt to capture the mind of the Nation brought to its complete fulfillment. But even now, the implications of this well-planned and concerted effort are rather frightening.

We have already seen too many cases in which honest and thoughtful educators have had to yield precious ground to self-appointed protectors of the public interest. It is no longer education when curricula and course content are tailored to meet the special demands of whatever private groups happen to be most vocal in the community.

No one of these techniques of mass persuasion is in itself entirely novel, nor did they become lobbying techniques only the day before yesterday. You as political scientists and I as a Member of Congress probably regard them as quite commonplace. But once again, you and I seem to be sharing a rather unpopular position. Virtually every organization appearing before our committee and a good part of the Nation's press have taken a contrary view. Lobbying, they say, consists solely of those techniques of direct contact which came to fullest flower in the 1870's and 1880's.

Thus, when we had the temerity to suggest that the systematic distribution of very extreme and one-sided economic and political propaganda might, under certain circumstances, be called lobbying, we were roundly damned as a group of despots trying to subvert the free-press guarantees of the Constitution. Groups like the Committee for Constitutional Government which have by their every deed shown nothing but contempt for our processes of popular government and free education took refuge behind a shifting variety of self-serving labels. Suddenly, from a self-interested pressure group of the most obvious kind, they were transformed into publishers, or educators—terms which they presumed to be more socially acceptable and less open to close examination than so flat a label as lobbyist. I must admit that it has been a great disappointment to me to see this cry taken up by so large a part of the Nation's press. We asked only that groups engaging in certain practices stand up and be counted honestly and openly under the mechanism provided by the Lobbying Act. But this, said the press, is tyranny; neither the people nor Congress have a right to the facts.

Now, I believe that a workable definition of terms is a necessary first step in any logical analysis. Defining lobbying, however, is peculiarly difficult, because the definitions given usually accord only with the special needs of the user. Why define lobbying at all then? Why not simply say that it is a term about which reasonable men may have differing opinions? Actually, the need for definition is not hard to find. Why should an act be classified as lobbying or nonlobbying at all, except that information about the former must be reported under the Lobbying Act? Most of the righteously narrow definitions of lobbying result from nothing more than deliberate unwillingness to accept this responsibility.

After months of investigation our committee finally concluded that any such definition was hopelessly limited and that the only practical criteria of lobbying were a purpose to influence legislative or administrative policy and the expenditure of substantial amounts of money for this purpose.

How do these criteria apply in practice to such activities as institutional advertising or mass pamphleteering? The expenditure of money for these things is easily established, but how do you establish their purpose? It seems to me that the ultimate test is always a negative one. Is it, for example, the intent of the Committee for Constitutional Government, or the Foundation for Economic Education that their books and pamphlets on public issue should have no effect on the determination of thees issues? To ask this question is usually to answer it.

What it all boils down to is this: Organized efforts to influence the governmental process are becoming as broad as our entire system to mass communications. These efforts may be labeled as education or publishing by those to whom the term "lobbying" is unpalatable; but if they meet the tests I have outlined, they are lobbying nonetheless and should be made matters of public information through the medium which the Lobbying Act provides. Lobbying today is group-oriented, and the characteristic approach is to public opinion and through this to public policy. If the principle of publicity embodied in the Lobbying Act is to have any meaning at all, it must be broad enough to encompass this approach.

I believe that our investigation has also provided evidence to support several generalizations relating to money in lobbying and the approximate balance of strength among the great organized groups which today seek to influence what government does.

Success in lobbying has always been closely related to the material and organizational resources of the parties concerned. Under present conditions, however, with so many conflicting voices clamoring to be heard by government, the relationship between these resources and successful special pleading has become almost absolute. All other things being equal, as, of course, they seldom are, "money talks" in modern lobbying to an unprecedented extent. Money alone cannot purchase legislation, but it can provide the means by which public policy decisions can be most effectively influenced. Certainly this does considerable violence to our traditional conception of lobbying as an area in which all the competitors are on a more or less equal footing. It does violence, too, to the belief that the sheer number of conflicting groups provides a built-in guaranty of responsible public policy. To the contrary, the more groups there are, the more certain it is that relatively few of them will be in a dominant position. In sum, our basic theory about the place and control of pressure groups is unrealistic.

Evidence of how this proposition works out in practice is provided in a special study conducted by the lobbying committee. In June of this year, we asked a selected list of approximately 200 corporations, trade unions, and farm organizations to submit on a voluntary basis an accounting of all expenditures relating to legislation made by them in the past 4 years. Information was requested under such categories as: cost of maintaining Washington offices, traveling and other expenses incurred in efforts to influence legislation, costs of advertising services, contributions to lobbying and trade associations, and expenditures for printed and duplicated matter. The corporation replies to this questionnaire are printed in full in a committee document entitled "Expenditures by Corporations to Influence Legislation," with which many of you are undoubtedly familiar. It is sufficient to say here that approximately 150 corporations replied to the letter in one way or another, and in their replies indicated expenditures for the purposes indicated of roughly $32,000,000 since August 1946. This figure is small in relation to the net assets of these corporations, but it is enormous when one considers that over the same period, all pressure groups combined have reported expenditures of only $55,000,000 under the Lobbying Act. Certainly this raises questions as to whether or not the equal rights of all groups to seek legislative remedies are not slightly hollow. As lobbying, broadly defined, becomes more and more a matter of large scale and very expensive public relations and so-called "educational" campaigns, it is clear that some sectors of society enjoy tremendous advantages over others in the struggle for influence.

Other results follow from the situation I have just discussed. As lobbying becomes more expensive, the pressure group's major financial burdens are and must be increasingly borne by a relatively small number of persons. This is not so much the case with old-line membership organizations such as trade associations, labor unions, farm and veterans groups, and the like. But it is very much the case with the self-styled leagues, committees, foundations, and institutes, which have leaped to the fore of the lobbying picture in the past few years. Virtually every such group investigated by our committee derived its major support from a very few sources. Whether it was the Committee for Constitutional Government on one extreme or the Civil Rights Congress on the other, the reliance on large contributors was similar. Yet these organizations and many others like them claim to speak for thousands of members and contributors. They may do this, but it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that they speak first for themselves and for the few persons from whom the bulk of their incomes are received. Many groups can thus claim to represent an impressive membership, when in reality they are merely the instruments of narrow and private ambition. It is in a way paradoxical that while the pressure groups of today purport to speak for mass memberships and address their appeals to mass audiences, the money still comes from the same old fat cats, whether they be of the right or the left. And it is even more ironic that even these fat cats aren't genuinely paying the bills, for their contributions are usually arranged so that they are either tax-exempt or tax-deductible. In the long run, the people pay.

I think that this year's experience also suggests some tentative conclusions about the growing juncture of lobbying and political action. Although some groups appearing before us—the Committee for Constitutional Government, for example—denied vigorously that they had ever sought to influence the election of anybody, most of our witnesses admitted—as they could not deny—that they implemented their lobbying with purely political activity. Here is just one more symptom of the broadening front in lobbying. Our hearings abound with examples of threatened reprisals, purges, withdrawn support and promises of aid in November. The great groups of today could not think of abstaining from an electoral contest in which they see their interest threatened. Their influence in politics is thus basically negative—that is, they can punish more effectively than they can reward. But this is nonetheless a significant influence, and it is constantly growing and will continue to grow so long as the popular basis of group strength continues to expand.

It is well, however, to ask what sort of effect this nonparty activity may have on our political system. Certainly politics by groups instead of parties is not the way to any kind of responsible party government. And insofar as these groups are narrowly controlled, their exercise of political power correspondingly diminishes the possibility of broadly representative government.

It is also well to ponder the status of these activities under the Corrupt Practices Acts. The basic problem here is one of definition, as it is under the Lobbying Act, and I believe that here, too, the inclusion of any activity under the publicity provisions of the Corrupt Practices Acts should be determined by the tests of intent and expenditure. Such publicity may not be wholly effective, but it is the only tool at our disposal.

I wish that time permitted me to go into some further detail on other aspects of our investigation which strike me as significant. I should like to discuss the growing massed effort of lobbying groups, for example, or the extent of what might be called interlocking directorates among these groups. But the whole picture is so complex and wide-ranging that I cannot hope to do it justice in a brief panel discussion.

I can, however, offer a brief summary impression of what lobbying means, where it is taking us, and what we can do about it. Lobbying is to me a big, a very big business. It involves the full time effort of thousands of people, and the expenditure of untold sums of money. It involves, further, the daily exercise of the personal and collective rights which keep our society relatively open and free. Yet at the same time, large-scale lobbying is a symptom of all the forces which might together pull our society apart at the seams. We talk about and urgently need a moral and practical unity which can help us to keep our sanity in a confused and threatening time. But the reality is one of group fighting group, interest fighting interest—all to wring some privilege or protection from a government which is often powerless to resist. Lobbying represents, in a word, a divisiveness which we cannot indefinitely afford.

What can be done? Above all, strengthen the Lobbying Act, enforce it vigorously, make it an instrument of more responsible public policy. This may not be a final or complete answer, but it is the best approach presently available. Ultimately, we shall have to face the task of reshaping our party system, perhaps along the lines so capably sketched in the recent report of this association's committee on political parties. We shall have to consider means of formalizing group interests in the political process. We shall have to reexamine our tax laws relating to tax exemption and deductibility. Reasonable men may differ as to the form of the remedies but it is clear that we shall have to develop such remedies or face the ultimate disintegration of representative government as we have known it. You, as political scientists, and I as a member of the world's greatest and most harried legislature, face few problems more challenging than this.

Hon. Adolph J. Sabath

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD BREEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. BREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to invite the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives to an editorial published in the Dayton Daily News, Friday, December 29.

The editorial spotlights the distinguished career of a gentleman who has served his district, his State, and Nation for 44 successive years as a Member of this honorable body.

Congratulations and good wishes to Congressman SABATH from all citizens of the Third District of Ohio accompany this editorial.

The editorial follows:

A VETERAN

Congressman ADOLPH JOACHIM SABATH has sat continuously in the American House of Representatives longer than any other man in congressional history. At the age of 84, Congressman SABATH is in his forty-fourth year of service in the House.

It is, in more than one respect, an amazing achievement.

Since 1907, when SABATH first entered Congress, there have been endless tides of politics to sweep the officeholders in and out again. There have been changes in congressional district boundaries, in party fortune, in people's minds.

Through it all, from 22 successive trials at the polls, SABATH emerged ahead. The fact argues an extraordinarily convincing SABATH. It argues an extraordinarily firm and stable electorate. Does no one in his Chicago district ever grow tired of hearing SABATH called "the just"?

ADOLPH SABATH entered Congress when Uncle Joe Cannon was as firmly master there as is another Uncle Joe today in another capital. Uncle Joe Cannon fell. ADOLPH SABATH marched right on. The Woodrow Wilson time was to his taste (SABATH is a Democrat). Even the Harding landslide could not bury him. Speakers rose and fell—Champ Clark, Gillett, Longworth, Garner, Rainey, Byrnes, Bankhead, Rayburn, Came the 1946 overturn, and MARTIN was Speaker. SABATH stayed right on.

Finally, the pleasantest comment of all on this record-breaking Congressman: his character through it all.

Congress, with its politics, is a toughening environment. Schemes and conspiracies whirl about your head. Temptations batter you. Worst temptation of all, the urge to lose faith in men, to grow cynical, to say that "every man has his price" and try to discover what that price is and pay it if you must.

This Chicago immigrant from Czechoslovakia, this justice of the peace there, this police-court magistrate risen to Congressman kept through it all the character with which he began. No stain, through all these years, has tarnished the name he bears. Was it his modesty saved him? He has put his 84 years of life, more than half of it spent in Congress, into a Who's Who 11 lines.

Lobbying

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK BUCHANAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include a statement which I made last Saturday concerning release of a report of the House Lobby Investigating Committee, of which I have the honor of being chairman.

I think that the Lobby Indexes which we have compiled will be of great assistance to the Members of Congress, and urge you all to keep them and use them.

The release is as follows:

Chairman FRANK BUCHANAN, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, of the House Lobby Investigating Committee, today announced the release of a Lobby Index for the years 1946–49. The index lists over 1,300 organizations and 2,000 individuals who filed reports under the Lobbying Act from its inception through the end of 1949. A similar index for 1950 will be released in the near future.

Chairman BUCHANAN said: "The primary aim of our committee has been to increase the amount of public information about lobbying. We do not believe in prohibiting or regulating organized attempts to influence legislation, but we do feel they should be carried on in the open. These indexes will provide Congress and the public with a handy guide as to just who does file the lobbying reports required by law.

"The index we are releasing today shows that there is need for greater compliance with the Lobbying Act by organizations rather than by individuals. Our investigation showed that the great bulk of money used to influence legislation is spent by organizations for pamphlets, advertising, and other activities. These activities are brought out in public as required by the Lobbying Act only when organizations themselves file lobbying reports. Reports by employees are of value, but must be supplemented by reports of the organizations which employ them. Our final report, which will be filed early next week, will treat this subject in greater detail."

The Brussels Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith a very informative article from the Christian Science Monitor by Joseph C. Harsch:

THE BRUSSELS CONFERENCE
(By Joseph C. Harsch)

WASHINGTON.—It can be reported that the American delegation which went to Brussels to carry forward the building of a defensible North Atlantic region did not commit the United States to a fixed number of American troops for Europe, or a fixed timetable for their dispatch.

On the contrary, the size and timing of the prospective American contribution to the collective security of the west is planned, contractually, in terms not of fixed time or numbers but rather in terms of a ratio based on what the Europeans do for themselves.

If there is no substantial European effort on its own behalf, there will be no substantial American contribution. What America does send will depend, rigidly, on what the Europeans do for themselves.

There does exist, of course, a general plan involving both what the Europeans will do and what America will contribute. Schedules have been worked out. For example, by X date, France expects to put Y numbers of divisions in Z condition at the disposal of General Eisenhower's new command.

There are also X, Y, and Z factors for Britain, the Benelux group, Denmark, Norway, Italy, and the other members of the North Atlantic Pact.

If all of these European members meet their performance schedules, then there is a contractual obligation on the United States to provide those amounts of dollars, equipment, and military units that have been judged appropriate to the European schedules. But the American commitment comes into operation only in proportion to the performance records of the European countries.

The specific amounts of money, equipment, and men that each member country proposes to provide is, of course, a closely kept military secret. The American delegates wish it were possible to make these schedules public, for to do so would dispel some of the anxiety in this country which arises from ignorance of what Europe is doing, and has promised to do in the future, for itself.

However, to tell the American public would also be to tell Russia. It is agreed among the signatories that the present strength of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization force, and the schedules for expansion of that force, are military secrets which must continue to be kept secret in the interests of the general security of all members.

All that can be told safely is that performance schedules exist, that the American military planners are pleased with the assignments most of the European countries have accepted for themselves; and that if, as, and when proof of performance is forthcoming, America is committed contractually to providing the appropriate American contributions.

This does not mean that we sit quietly on the side waiting to see what Europe will produce by a given date, and then proceed to organize our contribution. Rather, it means that we proceed to raise and equip the troops which will go to Europe at various stages if, in the meantime, the European countries are measuring up to their own schedules.

The American troops do not go, however, if the European countries fall down on their schedules. And the final size of the American contribution will be determined by what the European do for themselves. The immediate American task it to become ready to make the American contribution if, by the time the American contribution is ready, the Europeans have earned the right to it by their own efforts.

It is only right that Americans should be freed from any false fear that their delegates to the Brussels Conference signed commitments unrelated to European performance. There is a schedule of American military aid to Europe. It involves more American divisions to reinforce those present in Germany. But the schedule is not rigid. It is a flexible and variable quantity. It provides for a ratio of United States contributions. The ratio is a secret. It is not a secret that further American aid is conditioned upon the principle of European self-help.

Inside Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. M. G. BURNSIDE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to conclude an article by Victor Riesel released by the Post-Hall Syndicate. If the statements are substantially correct certainly a change is overdue.

The article follows:

INSIDE LABOR
(By Victor Riesel)

What this country needs is a good 5 cent phone call. For just a nickel, the Secretary of the Treasury can call Republic 5600 in Washington. That 5 cent piece can cost the Soviet Government hundreds of millions of American dollars—made by selling us slave labor goods, including Christmas tree trimmings.

This slave trade gives the Russian brain trust the solid American currency with which to pay the British and the French merchants for scarce metals, barbed wire, electrical equipment, and other engines of war flowing into Manchuria. And it can be stopped immediately by Secretary of the Treasury Snyder.

But he and his aides have been retorting to queries from Congressmen and myself with the jargon of the old-fashioned brush-off. Only a few days ago Assistant Secretary of the Treasury John S. Graham told two Congressmen:

"Ever since this question was first brought to our attention, the Treasury Department has been actively seeking information (to prove that the Soviet uses slave labor)."

Since Brother Graham can't find the evidence, he should telephone Republic 5600. That's the State Department. They have the evidence. They've been broadcasting it to the rest of the world—names, dates, places, and slave conditions. But if things are tough in Washington and the war budget is too high, I'm for letting the Treasury save its nickel. Here's the evidence, right from the State Department and Commerce Department records:

First, it should be known that where we only bought about $3,500,000 worth of slave goods monthly from Russia in 1949—this more than doubled after the Soviet's Korean and Chinese troops invaded South Korea. In other words, they sold us twice as much stuff to get twice as many dollars to bolster their credit standing with United States bucks in European markets. That's right from United States Government records.

We buy millions of dollars worth of Soviet crab meat. The Treasury Department refuses to close our ports to the stuff. Yet the State Department Voice of America reports the following:

The (Soviet) crab trust at Vladivostok operates ships of about 3,000 tons manned by crews of 500. The crab catchers live a very confined life aboard ship for the 5 or 6 months' voyage to Kamchatka waters. After the trip they live in prison barracks on Deomid Bay during the winter months when they overhaul and outfit the ships for the next season.

The crabs are canned on board ship and sent to England, France, and the United States.

I submit, that's evidence enough Mr. Secretary, that the Treasury Department is violating section 307 of the Walsh Tariff Act of 1930—which says "that our ports shall be closed to slave labor imports."

Now, there are fur merchants, concentrated in New York, who have just signed contracts with the Soviet trusts for the new Russian fur crop due for delivery in February. Odd, isn't it, that some men should deify the dollar and not their country's youth dying on fronts as frozen as the hearts of these dealers in luxuries? But it's odder still that the Treasury Department takes no notice of the State Department's Voice of America disclosures that:

"Three-fourths of the furs from the Taiga region are exported. * * * The formerly independent fur trappers and hunters are now collectivized, they sell to the state at fixed prices. They are paid largely in goods."

This means that the fur trappers are imprisoned on their hunting grounds and are given subsistence foods. That is slave labor.

This country also imports millions upon millions of dollars worth of Stalinist timber. The Voice of America discloses that the Soviet has a syndicate of slave camps, part of which is the Kondopoga combine.

Says the Voice:

"Timber cut by slave labor at the Kondopoga combine was shipped abroad via the White Sea Canal * * * pine and Karelian birch were shipped abroad from the slave-built port of Soroka and the timber was likewise shipped from Archangel and Murmansk."

More evidence? We're buying about $2,000,000 worth of slave-labor materials from Czechoslovakia—the nation which houses the Skoda works, producing the armaments which United States intelligence officers have found equipping the Soviet Chinese armies. I have a list of 38 Czech slave camps—including the biggest one near Cop, the concentration camp for deportation of slaves to Russia itself.

It took the Commerce Department 6 months to shut off sales to the oriental Stalinists. How long will it take the Treasury Department to slash Red sales to us? There's a lot of shot in that buck they get from us.

Don't Tie Our Hands in War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RAY J. MADDEN
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the boys today in Korea could give us some real constructive suggestions on the best military method to save thousands of our GI fighters. Maybe the time is ripe for a few bombs on industrial targets far back beyond the North Korean border. The million Chinese Communists closing in on our boys cannot fight without support and supplies from the rear. H. B. Snyder, of the Gary (Ind.) Post-Tribune, set out a thought in the following editorial:

DON'T TIE OUR HANDS IN WAR

In their widely circulated Stockholm appeal for the outlawing of the A-bomb, the Russians did their work well. A good part of Europe already is acting as if the bomb were indeed outlawed.

Even among those who understand the A-bomb is no more immoral than any other weapon of war, there are urgings against its use by the United States unless it has been dropped on us first.

This is strange reasoning from allegedly mature men, Europe's keenest observers, including some satellite diplomats, believe firmly that our possession of the atomic bomb is the one great deterrent to a Russian effort to conquer western Europe.

There's not the slightest doubt that at this stage of our military preparedness the bomb is the only weapon we have which could inflict real damage on the Soviet Union should it march tomorrow. To be barred from using it is to be robbed of an effective club against Russian aggression.

Furthermore, air force officials believe there would be grave risk in waiting to employ the A-bomb. Though doubters continue to turn up, our experts believe the Russians have the bomb themselves. Certainly, to play it safe, we must assume they have and can make at least a dozen or a score a year.

What would it mean to allow the Russians to drop the bomb first? Not only colossal damage to key cities, but possibly the immobilizing, right at the start, of our own A-bomb effort.

The Russians know where our strategic air force is based, where our oil is, where A-bombs are produced. If we're lucky, they don't know where finished bombs are stored.

But it's evident they might, with suicide squadrons carrying either the A-bomb or even just old-fashioned block-busters, do irreparable harm to our key striking force before it could make itself felt. To risk that is to risk total defeat.

Strategic air officers are wholly aware of this peril and it worries them greatly. So, incidentally, does the prospect of internal sabotage which might ground many bombers we'd need to carry the A-bomb to Russia.

Should a war come, our hands must not be tied as to the use of the one great weapon in our arsenal. Those who argue that we should wait are, perhaps unconsciously, arguing a counsel of defeat.

Year of Centennial Opening in Span of New York Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of January 1, 1951:

YEAR OF CENTENNIAL OPENING IN SPAN OF NEW YORK TIMES—PANORAMA OF PROGRESS SINCE SEPTEMBER 18, 1851, SHOWS ADHERENCE TO THE AEGIS OF ITS FOUNDERS AND THEIR SUCCESSOR IN 1896

(By Meyer Berger)

The New York Times starts its centennial year today. It will be 100 years old on September 18, 1951.

The newspaper was founded by a group that included Henry Jarvis Raymond, of Lima, N. Y., George Jones, of East Poultney, Vt., and Edward B. Wesley, of Albany, N. Y.

Later Times backers included Fletcher Harper, Jr., of Harper & Bros., who had started their magazine in 1850; E. B. Morgan, of Aurora, N. Y., a pioneer in Wells Fargo Express, and Leonard Jerome, former Prime Minister Winston Churchill's grandfather.

Mr. Raymond began his newspaper career on Horace Greeley's New York Tribune, and was one of the most distinguished journalists of the period. Mr. Jones worked in the Tribune business office at the same time. They became friends there.

Mr. Raymond had talked for years of the need for a newspaper that would focus sharply on important news and devote less space to personal feuds between owners of competing sheets, or to crusading for causes in which the owners were personally interested, a common journalistic weakness of the fifties.

He wrote the Times prospectus early in 1851 and Mr. Wesley read his copy on July 4 that year to friends lolling on the sun-warmed ruins of old Fort Putnam at West Point, N. Y. They thought it sound.

The document called for a 1-cent newspaper to be circulated in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, and Williamsburgh. It promised correspondence from intelligent gentleman permanently enlisted in its support.

It also promised full reports on Government affairs, on religious matters, on agriculture, the sciences, industry, and literary reviews and intelligence prepared by competent persons, besides impartial reporting on drama, music, and on the arts generally.

The Times, the prospectus said, "is not established for the advancement of any party, sect, or person * * * will seek to be conservative in such a way as shall best promote needful reform * * * will endeavor to perpetuate the good, and to avoid the evil. * * * Its main reliance for all improvement, personal, social and political, will be upon Christianity and republicanism."

The Republican accent was prophetic; Mr. Raymond was to make history as "godfather of the Republican Party."

The Times founders were committed in the prospectus to try to encourage and advance education, to promote economy, concord and justice in every section of the country; to elevate and enlighten public sentiment; and to substitute reason for prejudice, a cool and intelligent judgment for passion, in all public affairs and in all discussions of public affairs.

Mr. Wesley, a broker, was impressed. He raised $100,000 for the venture, he and Mr. Jones each contributing $20,000. Mr. Raymond had no cash to put up but got a substantial share of stock for his talents and for his enterprise.

The first edition of the Times was put out under physical handicap. New York had about 500,000 residents then and was in a building boom. Carpenters and other artificers were overwhelmed by contracts and a little hamstrung by a shortage of building materials.

CENTURY'S CONTRAST IN EDITIONS

There were no windows or light fixtures in the five-story building at 113 Nassau Street, when Mr. Raymond opened shop there in early September 1851. He and his staff wrote their stories for the first issue in longhand by wavering candlelight and had frequent resort to matches as cool night breezes swooped through the window frames, playfully snuffing the candles' flame.

There was no telegraph at 113 Nassau Street then, and the Atlantic cable had not been put down; but the Times on September 18, 1851, carried proportionately more national and international news than any other New York newspaper published that day, and in the days that came after. It was, perhaps, a little weaker on local items, but that department improved as the staff grew.

Most of the foreign news items had come from London on the Royal Mail Steamer Europe, then by rail from Boston. Most of it was at least 12 days old, much of it older, but that was fast for those days and the London representative had put aboard newspaper files from all parts of the continent.

Today more than 1,000,000 words and the equivalent of about 250,000 more in financial tables pour into the Times over communication devices that might have made Mr. Raymond and his contemporaries gape, but the 1851 staff was almost boastfully proud of the speed it had made with the news it got into that first edition 100 years ago.

Most of the foreign items were culled directly from newspapers of the countries where the stories originated, which was then common journalistic practice. Mr. Raymond preceded these with a crisp summary not unlike the current Times front-page feature, World News Summarized.

A good bit of space that first day went to Britain's astonishment over the yacht America's defeat of Britain's best in the Solent. There was a long piece on excitement in Paris over the pending Louis Napoleon-Prince de Joinville contest, and there were many items from other countries, each impressively headlined with the name of the place of origin.

There had been a fugitive-slave riot in Lancaster County in Pennsylvania and Mr. Raymond's staff had gleaned their facts about it from Pennsylvania and Maryland newspapers.

The almost inevitable weather story had the lead under the headline, New York City, and was offered in neighborly style:

"The weather was the theme upon which we hinged an item for our morning edition, but we have been forced to forego the infliction of it upon the public by the proceedings of the Boston Jubilee which our special correspondent has forwarded to us. Never mind, the President (Millard Fillmore) cannot always be lionizing through the country, and as soon as he returns home we shall endeavor to do this important subject full justice."

Workmen, the local column reported, were finishing the fountain on Washington Square, which only a few decades before had been a public burial ground out in the country. There was a new steamboat service between Manhattan and rural Flushing (fare, 1 shilling) and the city hall fire watcher had sounded the cupola bell twice to bring out volunteer companies. A Broadway omnibus team had fractured a pedestrian's skull.

"A bloomer costume," another local item said, "made its appearance in Sixth Avenue day before yesterday. A crowd of Conservatives manifested their hostility to this progressive movement by derision."

This was all front-page stuff. There was a separate heading for news from Brooklyn, then an independent city, and a note from Long Island about a tomato grown by Mr. Frederick Rowland, of Hempstead, that weighed 2 pounds and 3¼ ounces.

Mostly, though, the Times gave its space to graver news, and prospered because of it. In its second year it went to eight pages, twice as many as it printed throughout its first year, and kept growing in prestige, size, and circulation with advancing time.

Mr. Raymond's formula had worked and there were few departures from it in the newspaper's century of existence. It steadfastly remained pretty much a day-by-day account of human achievement. Its files faithfully trace man's errors as well as his stubborn advance toward better living.

The files are packed with national, and world, history. There is, for example, a comprehensive obituary on Daniel Webster done in longhand by Mr. Raymond himself and a remarkable record of the Civil War, of events leading up to it, of the Reconstruction, and Abraham Lincoln's administration.

The Gettysburg Address was front-paged, but editorially next day the Times thought Edward Everett's speech at Gettysburg more eloquent and more enduring. Most other newspapers similarly misappraised the Lincoln classic.

Mr. Raymond, physically small, had extraordinary courage. One night in July, 1863, after he had editorially called on the law to crush looting bands of antidraft rioters in New York City, they marched on the Times office at 41 Park Row, heavily armed and calling for his blood.

Mr. Raymond and Winston Churchill's grandfather quietly waited for the mob as it poured down from The Bowery whooping and hollering into Printing House Square. Both sat behind the new-fangled Gatling guns ready to spray the rioters, but the hoodlums learned about the guns and swerved off.

When they set fires in the Tribune office across the square, Mr. Raymond sent 16 of his men armed with rifles, to help police drive off the mob.

The Times' account of the shooting of Abraham Lincoln at Ford's Theatre, headlined "Awful event," still brings that sad incident into tragically sharp focus. The editors made one major error that night; they put black borders around all front-page columns, but the President had not died when the edition went to press.

BATTLING THE TWEED RING

When Mr. Raymond died in 1869, Mr. Jones took over. He clung to Mr. Raymond's basic policies, even in costly crucial periods. He attacked the Tweed ring in 1871 when other newspapers closed their eyes to the ring's unholy plundering of New York City's funds, and coldly turned down a $5,000,000 cash bribe proffered by Dick Connelly, a Tweed lieutenant sent to call the Times off.

The Times remained almost uncompromisingly Republican until James Blaine was nominated by the party to run for President in 1884. Then after its warnings that he was unfit for the office of Chief Executive went unheeded, it reluctantly backed the Democrat, Grover Cleveland, who won. From that time on it remained politically independent.

Hard times weakened the newspaper after Mr. Jones' death in 1891. By 1896 its circulation was down to around 9,000 copies a day and the group of Times men who had bought it from the Jones heirs were in despair. The plant that Mr. Jones had built and expanded at 41 Park Row, once the handsomest newspaper establishment in the city, was shabby, its presses needed replacement and the revenue from advertising had faded almost to vanishing.

On August 18, 1896, after the Times had gone bankrupt, it was taken over by Adolph S. Ochs, a young publisher who had purchased the Chattanooga Times in Tennessee and developed it as one of the best newspapers in the South.

Mr. Ochs had arrived independently at the same news principles that Mr. Raymond had conceived but which had somehow faded and withered on the New York Times.

"It will be my earnest aim," Mr. Ochs wrote for the issue of January 19, 1896, "that the New York Times give the news, all the news, in concise and attractive form, in language that is parliamentary in good society, and give it as early, if not earlier, than it can be learned through any other reliable medium; to give the news impartially without fear or favor, regardless of any party, sect, or interest involved * * *."

The new publisher, a printer by trade, used his knowledge of this art to give the Times a neater, cleaner format. He introduced better and more ample business and financial news features, an illustrated Sunday supplement (now the Sunday Magazine) and a weekly section devoted to news and reviews of books.

In 1898, after Mr. Ochs' meagre starting capital had been spent in vain effort to compete with the New York World and the New York Journal, both rich publications which spent comparative fortunes on Spanish-American war coverage, he dropped the price of the Times to 1 cent.

This measure of desperation became effective, on October 10, 1898. The publisher's contemporaries were sure that the move would prove suicidal; that the price drop would lead readers to think that The Times had cheapened in all respects.

Mr. Ochs said: "It is the price of the newspaper, not its character that will change" and when readers realized that this was fact, the Times won thousands of new readers and increasingly greater advertising volume. It moved out front as one of the world's leading newspapers and stayed there.

Times Tower was finished in 1905 and Times Square took its name from it. Eight years later the newspaper needed a large annex in Forty-third Street, west of the Square. Subsequent additions inspired by circulation and advertising gains and for more space for news-handling, the last finished after the close of the Second World War, gave the Times one of the largest newspaper publishing plants in the world.

Since Mr. Ochs' death in 1935 the newspaper's high-quality news traditions has been furthered under his son-in-law, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, the Times today has more than 1,300 correspondents on full or on part-time assignment, and unmatched communications facilities for handling their copy. Mr. Raymond's entire working force had fewer than 50 men. The Times today employs more than 4,000 men and women. In Mr. Sulzberger's regime, the Times has increased its prestige in the news-gathering field which has been reflected in its advertising and circulation growth.

In 1851 the total circulation of New York's 15 newspapers was 130,000 a day. The New York Times circulation, 100 years later, is more than 1,100,000 on Sunday and in excess of 535,000 daily. In 1950 the Times carried more than 39,500,000 lines of advertising the highest amount in its century of existence.

Mr. Raymond's Times used a total of 30,000,000 newsprint pages between September 18, 1851, and September 18, 1852. More than fifteen and one-half times that amount of newsprint was used for one recent Sunday edition, or just one day's press run. The change has been that great.

There have been other remarkable changes in the 100 years since 1851—such changes and mutations as the Times founders could never have conceived in their most fantastic dreaming; yet based, fundamentally, on their original formula for faithful news presentation.

The decision to create a newspaper that would be as complete a human record as possible has endured for 100 years. Historians who pore over Times pages can easily trace a century of mortal progress and recession there. The acorn and the oak come quickly visible to discerning eyes.

On Tuesday, June 13, 1854, for example, the first four columns in The Times told under the headline "Japan opened," what Commodore Perry had achieved in commercial treaty negotiations at Yedo, now called Tokyo.

The article was complete with interesting detail on the Japanese resources, habits, customs, and beliefs, all pretty much unknown to the average reader in 1851. A side story told of the burial of Robert Williams of the United States Marine Corps who had died aboard the U. S. S. Mississippi during Perry's visit.

Almost 100 years later a Times man hovered over Nagasaki in a B-29 to report in detail the destruction wrought by an atomic bomb. And now in Yedo the Times has its own news bureau equipped to communicate by telephone, wireless, or cable with the home office off Times Square.

News of Perry's achievement in Japan was 10 weeks reaching the Times. Today news of that country, of Korea, India, China, Tibet, and other Far East places where history is bubbling, gets to the office in split seconds when such speed is necessary.

One hundred years of important human undertakings everywhere on the globe, under its vast waters and in the skies above it, have been fixed in the Times record in printer's ink to cover one century in the Day Book of Mankind.

Centennial Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the New York Times of January 1, 1951.

CENTENNIAL YEAR

This New Year's Day has a special meaning for those concerned with the New York Times. With this issue we enter the centennial year of this newspaper's establishment. To be precise, our first issue went hopefully to the public on September 18, 1851. We shall take note of that approaching day on various suitable occasions during the year.

Meanwhile this point in time—this New Year's Day—when all the world is looking forward, with perhaps a little less hope than usual and a little more apprehension than usual, seems also a good occasion to look back. Morning by morning for close to a hundred years the present and earlier staffs of this newspaper have produced in print the materials of history. Tuesday morning has rarely seemed very different from Monday morning, but all the Mondays and Tuesdays, all the days of the week, all the years, have added up to the most tremendous century in mankind's records.

Eighteen years ago, at the time of the Chicago World's Fair, there appeared a stimulating volume called A Century of Progress. There was reason for that title. There would be reason for it now in many fields. But the phrase cannot be so lightly used today. We have to ask, progress in what? We have to admit that in some fields there has not only been no progress but distinct retrogression. We have to admit that in some respects humanity's expectations, fondly cherished in 1851, have been disappointed. Miraculous achievements in promoting human well-being have been offset by the failure of mankind to organize a just and peaceable world society. Inventions have solved problems—and created them.

Perhaps the greatest achievement of the century has been in its startling improvement in communications and means of travel. There is scarcely such a thing as distance any more. In our new ability to exchange ideas and move from place to place we have a new key to freedom. All races and all nations are now neighbors. Unhappily—and this is the saddest irony of history—this has not made them behave like neighbors.

Let us make an honest comparison between the state of the world—and especially of that part of it known as the United States—in 1851 and its condition now. To extend such a comparison in detail would require a volume. Still, we may arrive at some defensible deductions.

I. THE GOOD OLD DAYS

The American citizen of 1851 really felt himself in the midst of a period of breathtaking developments. He, or his father, had seen the steamboat appearing on the navigable rivers and even crossing the Atlantic Ocean. He had seen steam power widely applied in new factories. He had seen a rapid spread of the steam-powered railroad. The country was even then in the midst of a railroad fever which, between 1848 and 1857, added more than 10,000 miles of line to an existing 6,000. The magnetic telegraph was being rapidly extended. News was beginning to come while it was still fresh. The McCormick reaper, the sewing machine, and the whale-oil lamp were transforming various phases of life. A few people already had in their houses hot and cold running water and even bathrooms. The rotary printing press was about to bring to the masses the newspaper which previously had been accessible only to the few.

This was a period of prosperity and expansion. The United States had just extended its boundaries south to the Rio Grande and west to the Pacific. Beyond the Mississippi and the Missouri there were vast areas suitable for settlement and into which a never-ending stream of hopeful settlers was moving. The gold of California was flowing eastward and out into world markets.

After the railroads reached the Great Lakes and pushed across the Mississippi and even the Missouri a new kind of East-and-West trade sprang up. New banks and great new masses of investment capital were thrown in to deal with this expansion. Farm products and raw materials from the West began to flow eastward, first through such channels as the Erie Canal, but later, in the mid-century period, by rail. Eastern manufacturers found a new market for their goods, which began to move westward. There seemed to be no end to this growth of the Nation.

Labor was sharing this prosperity, although its share would not be regarded today as extravagant. Immigrants building the new railroad lines worked from sunrise to twilight for less than a dollar a day. Yet real wages were on the way up and the length of the working day was on the way down. Ten hours was standard in Government service and 10 hours was the goal toward which labor unions were striving.

The decade of the forties had seen the rise of a great wave of humanitarianism, and the fifties were to see the continuance of this movement until it was swallowed up in the drive against slavery and the vast agony of the Civil War. There was a new sensitiveness to the problems of the blind, of the juvenile and adult delinquent, of the mentally disturbed. All these groups were being treated far more intelligently and kindly than they had ever been before in human history. Democracy was broadening from a mere concept of individual rights to one of individual and community responsibility.

Along with this humanitarian drive there went a great many fringe movements. People came to believe, more or less passionately, in the possibilities of phrenology, mesmerism, temperance, and various species of primitive communism. It may seem strange that so many attempts should be made to improve on capitalism when capitalism was really doing quite well, but such was the case. Many Americans of the mid-century were not patient enough to wait for utopia. They wanted it right away. They were still to learn of the Darwinian concept of change, which a few years later was to affect not only scientific thought but also the idea of human progress and development.

If the people of 1851 compared their condition and their prospects with those of almost any preceding generation, they had a right to be pleased with the world.

II. AND DAYS NOT SO GOOD

But if the citizen of 1851 had been able to compare his lot with ours in 1951, he would have realized that in some respects he was not, comparatively speaking, well off.

The Nation's health by modern standards was not good. Boston about 1851 had a death rate of 24.30 a thousand, New York 30 a thousand. The causes of typhoid, tuberculosis, diphtheria, cholera, scarlet fever, lockjaw, yellow fever, and some other diseases were not even known, and people continued to die of them. Infants and children perished by the thousands of ailments easily preventable today. Cholera followed the California emigrant up the great rivers and across the plains. There were, and continued to be for many years, epidemics of yellow fever in southern cities—and many cases even in the North. The gift of life, which we may think of as bestowed on every child at birth, was more than a third smaller than it is today.

The food of most Americans was inadequate, with few fresh vegetables during the greater part of the year and almost no use of salads. Much of the milk sold in cities was literally poison, killing children instead of nourishing them. The public water supply in countless communities was polluted. We were called, and probably were, a nation of dyspeptics. Patent medicines flourished, as newspaper advertisements of that day attest, and probably added to the national distemper.

Everybody agreed, as everybody does now, that there cannot be a high level of democracy without a high level of education. America was starting to educate itself. During the fifties there was a great spread of academies. Some public high schools were established and quite a few colleges took root, especially in the newer States. In 1851 perhaps 250,000 young persons were attending secondary schools. Yet today, in proportion to the population, four or five times as many are going to secondary schools. As for higher education, American youth has a far better chance to go to college nowadays than it had to go to an often very poor secondary school a century ago. The higher education of professional men, with the exception of clergymen and lawyers, was in 1851 haphazard and imperfect indeed.

Half the adult population was still subjected in many respects to almost feudal restrictions. The first woman's rights convention met in Seneca Falls, N. Y., in 18'8, and as the years passed some of the grosser inequities of woman's position were remedied. But it was to take more than two generations to give woman the vote, and perhaps a little longer than that to give her anything like true equality in the day's work outside the home.

This optimistic generation of 1851 had been attracted by a romantic and world-wide peace movement. Queen Victoria in that very year thought that the coming together of representatives of many nations at the Crystal Palace Exposition in London might lead to perpetual peace. But some bad years were ahead. The horrid specter had not been exorcised. The Taiping Rebellion was to slaughter millions in China. The Crimean War was only 3 years off, the Indian mutiny only 6 years off, our own Civil War only 10 years off. European absolutists, after crushing the democratic uprisings of 1848, were setting the stage for future conflict.

Yet the America of 1851 was hopeful to the point of extravagance. It regarded the democratic system as a proved experiment which would sweep the world, on the American plan, as rapidly as it could be brought to the world's attention. Americans thought that the kings and the emperors would fall of their own weight. They also thought that this country had a manifest destiny. We of today are realizing that that phrase was accurately right, but we have discovered that manifest destiny may require sweat and tears before it is realized. The hopes of 1851 have for us now a nostalgic pathos. But hope—the expectation of better and better things to come—was also a tremendous spiritual asset. We can envy them their abundant possession of it.

We may as well face the fact that the Americans of 1851 were easier in their minds than we are. In the simple meaning of the word, and except when personal disaster struck them, when illness, bereavement, and death came among them, they may have been happier than we are. For if there is one thing the century has shown, it is that happiness does not necessarily come from the multiplication of inventions. It cannot come securely without one final invention—a system by which men of different groups and different nations and different occupations can get on peaceably together.

The makers of newspapers must be peculiarly sensitive to this fact. In a hundred years they have seen the development of instantaneous communication with all the world's centers. They have found it possible to spread the printed word quickly over great areas by using the airplane and other devices. They are able to dispatch their reporters in a matter of days—or even hours—to almost any point on the earth's surface. They can multiply their product prodigiously, to almost any desired extent and at almost any desired speed. In the western countries they speak to publics which are almost wholly literate.

But swift and full communication does not of necessity make for agreement. From lands afflicted with a new barbarism come hot and angry words—and black lies.

III. DANGERS—AND DREAMS

This brief glance back over the century may appear to have led us to a gloomy conclusion. That assumption might be justified if the history of the future were to be only a continuation of modern history since 1914, with its wars, hot and cold, its new and terrible doctrines and its frontal attack on the ideals of democracy.

Yet in balancing our ledger we must consider all the possibilities. The conquest of the atom has made war so dreadful that it may destroy all that we call civilization. Yet the control of atomic fission is a stage in an evolution of science that could lead man to the stars. If all that is scientifically known today could be made available to the multitudinous populations of the world without restraint, the earth could truly become almost a paradise. Death could not be abolished, nor would a wise man wish it to be, but a full natural term of life could be lived with joy and great achievement by millions who now never so much as dream what such a life could be. The labor under which men have bent so long and under which countless millions of them still are bowed down could be made easy. The world's homes could be comfortable and healthful. The great ideas of the older civilization and the new could reach everyone.

What we immediately face today is something far different. We face the diversion of vast sums of money and a great part of our raw materials and manufactured goods, of our best energies, toward military preparation. This is purely defensive, but it eats into our well-being just the same. We face at the very best a long period of diminished living standards, during which it will be hard to plan for the future.

But if this is a time of strain, of sacrifice and of fear, it is also a time of opportunity. Free and civilized man has never won his freedom or his civilization without struggle. He has always had enemies. The darker forces of human destiny have always worked against him. Now, perhaps, he is about to reach his supreme challenge. Let us not say this challenge will be the test of battle. Let us not admit the inevitability of another great war. The challenge rather is one of faith. In the midst of all the trials and hardships which will surely come, we must stand firm for our ideals. If free and civilized man believes passionately in freedom and civilization, those values will never vanish from the earth.

IV. THE TASKS AHEAD

The days will continue to pass and again the Tuesdays will somewhat resemble the Mondays. The presses will begin to roar at their stipulated times each night, continuing into the morning. There will be great technical changes in the production of newspapers and other means of communication. We have not reached the end of that road yet. Our ways of living will be altered by events we cannot foresee. The world of a hundred years from now will probably show greater changes than we have been able to detect between 1851 and 1951.

But in certain essentials there has been no change since 1851. Truth, though viciously betrayed, is nevertheless what it was then—and this newspaper will continue to seek it. Honor is what it was then—and we hope never to be false to it. The brotherhood of man was an ideal then—and it remains such. Freedom and justice, compassion and hope, the aspiration toward something higher and better—these come from time out of mind and endure forever.

We do not set foot in this second century with a careless optimism that all will be well. All is not well, and all will not be well. But the challenge to stand by our principles and to advance our ideals remains. We who are engaged in the making of this newspaper have confidence that this generation will not flinch and that the generations which come after us, after we have laid down our tools and closed our desks for the last time, will keep the faith.

Topics of the Times

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of January 1, 1951:

TOPICS OF THE TIMES

NEW YORK A CENTURY AGO

The New York City of 1851, when the New York Times began publication at 113 Nassau Street, had a population of fewer than 600,000. Brooklyn was regarded as a suburb, although a booming one, with about 150,000 souls. Manhattan, in the 1850 census, had counted 515,547 and so was exceeded in population by only a third of the States. New York State all told had only just passed the 3,000,000 mark. Anything above Fiftieth Street was regarded as country. The Bronx had a population of only about 8,000, and Staten Island of those days had twice as many as the Bronx, while Queens had about 20,000.

It was a time when the city government's expenditures in a year were running at about $2,500,000 and the receipts at about $108,000, a discrepancy not always redressed in later times, when our budget has risen to a billion and a quarter dollars a year, while capital outlays added millions to the total.

TRAFFIC AND STREETS

Streets were constantly being opened, railroads were being built, and the common council was in a steady dither of activity granting franchises, all the while being denounced as conniving crooks. Fifth Avenue was being graded and curb and gutter stones laid between Thirty-fourth and Forty-second Streets. A. T. Stewart was completing a large store on the easterly side of Broadway at Chambers Street to enhance what was already "the most magnificent dry goods establishment in the world." The "mania for converting Broadway into a street of shops is greater than ever."

A shortage of parks was already being recognized; there were, in fact, only 19 in the city, covering 170 acres of land. Now, of course, there are about 27,000 acres of parks in the larger consolidated city of our day.

Yet it was, in some respects, still a slow-moving city. The common council permitted the Hudson River Railroad to "propel their cars from Chambers Street to Thirty-first Street by their street locomotive or 'dumb engine' upon the condition that the same shall not be run at a greater speed than 6 miles an hour, and also, that they shall employ a proper person to precede the trains on horseback to give the necessary warning in a suitable manner of their approach."

HOW THE WORD WAS SPREAD

Fires and an adequate means of giving warning were a major problem. The first iron fire tower in the city (wooden ones had been burning down) was completed in midsummer of 1851. About a hundred feet high, with a stairway to the lookout station on top, it was situated on Thirty-third Street and cost $6,000.

Fire or fear of fire caused horrible tragedies. A false alarm led to a panic in a Greenwich Avenue school in November 1851, and about 50 children were killed because doors swung inward. The law requiring outward opening doors in public buildings dates from that disaster.

GAS AND CANDLES

Gas street lights were going up. But candles were still widely in use in the home. General Garibaldi, the Italian patriot who had arrived in New York in August 1850, spent the following winter on Staten Island engaged in the business of candle-making. The telegraph had been invading the city, and at mid-century poles were being erected along Wall Street and Broadway. At the same time the handsome sum of $2,000 was being spent to work Fifth Avenue from One Hundred and Ninth to One Hundred and Twentieth Streets as a country road.

One, P. T. Barnum, had come upon the scene, and was now enlarging his museum at Broadway and Ann Street at a cost of $30,000. The result was a spacious and elegant saloon which could seat 3,000 persons in comfort. To his already extensive world of curiosities he added a Chinese collection.

The first elevators were being built, portending the skyscraper.

FINE FEATHERS SHOWN

There were some fine mansions. One of these at Fifth Avenue and Ninth Street, which had belonged to the late Henry Brevoort, sold to a new owner for $57,000. James Fenimore Cooper, while staying at the Globe Hotel, wrote to his wife in Cooperstown of things he had been hearing and seeing. A Mrs. Wetmore had appeared at a party wearing a dress, including jewels, that cost $30,000 (in predevaluation currency). Mr. Cooper thought this was doing "pretty well for New York." He found the town is a great arena for the women to show off their fine feathers in.

The common council expressed appropriately its sense of responsibility for promoting international amity by spending $550 to send copies of Audubon's birds and quadrupeds as a gift to France. It was also ordered by the controller to quit feeding itself in the late afternoon at the taxpayers' expense.

President Fillmore and his Cabinet came to New York to celebrate the opening of the Erie Railroad from Piermont on the Hudson to Dunkirk on Lake Erie. And Jenny Lind had been singing at Castle Garden at fees that would have been considered respectable even in our day.

There were about 20 daily newspapers in the city, and obviously they had plenty of news to report.

One Hundred Years on the Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the New York Times of January 1, 1951:

ONE HUNDRED YEARS ON THE RECORD

(By Anne O'Hare McCormick)

The fateful year that opens today marks the end of one century and the beginning of another in the life of this newspaper. Elsewhere on this page is an outline of the changes that have taken place since 1851 in the way of life and outlook in the United States. To the psalmist a thousand years may be as a day, but no millennium of time has been so crowded with events, so shaken by political, social, and technical revolutions, as the past hundred years. Day by day the New York Times has gathered from all quarters of the earth the news of these happenings. They are now on the record—a record which leads page after page to a world that would have been unimaginable to the readers of the first issue of the paper.

GROWTH OF PUBLIC OPINION

In retrospect it is clear that news is the destroyer of illusions and the ultimate policy maker. That is why a free and responsible press is as essential to popular government as an alert intelligence service is to an army in action or planning action. It is highly dangerous to move in either field without eyes. A century ago very few Americans had anything to do with the formulation of foreign policy. Now it is made by public opinion; practically the whole population takes part in the current debate on a world defense strategy versus a hemispheric program. The latter position is about where we stood in 1851 when the Monroe Doctrine was practically our only definite line of international policy.

The change is due to many causes. The United States was not conscious of itself as a world power in the midnineteenth century. It was the eve of the Civil War, when great internal dissensions absorbed us and foreign affairs and external dangers concerned us very little. Less than 10 percent of the population was foreign-born, and several decades were to pass before great waves of immigration brought the echoes of Europe's problems to our shores.

But the main reason for the difference in participation in foreign policy then and now is that we are better informed. The spread of news, brought to us instantly by new means of communication, makes events the motive force that sets minds and emotions working. The country clamors for firm and clear leadership, but it would take a very tough-minded and persuasive leader to overcome the influence of events—sometimes the most transient events—in deciding popular reactions.

For good or ill, foreign policy today is shaped in public debate. It is plain now that the contests of this century, whether waged against Germans or Russians, are wars of the free peoples against dictatorships and their inevitable drive for more power. It is likewise plain that these wars, though ostensibly won, have narrowed the areas of democracy. On the other hand, where democracy prevails, it is certainly more active and articulate than in the past. Government in democratic states is more difficult just because the people demand a greater voice in it.

In the early days of this paper foreign policy was left to the State Department because it seemed comparatively unimportant. This does not mean, however, that people were not interested in what was going on abroad. At least the Times thought so. For many decades the paper has been noted for its wide coverage of foreign news, but in going through a collection of historic pages one is surprised to find that almost from the beginning it maintained correspondents in London and Paris. The arrival of steamships with European papers was the occasion for first-page reviews of foreign news. News came slowly, often 2 or 3 weeks after the event, but it was extraordinarily comprehensive. In the issue containing the account of the inaugural of President Buchanan, March 7, 1857, the report from Europe filled a column on the front page. October 18, 1859, there were two columns about the uprising at Harpers Ferry and three and a half of foreign news, including the story of an attempted insurrection against the Sultan in Constantinople, a statement of Kossuth on the Hungarian question, a report on the Italian liberation movement, an item about the French Army, and an editorial from the Times of London on the San Juan boundary dispute. Even when the War Between the States was at its height, there was room for reports of European reactions and the Slidell mission to obtain recognition and aid for the Confederacy. And, of course, a full-page spread when the Spanish, French, and British, taking advantage of American preoccupation in the war, formed a coalition to take over Mexico and landed an expedition at Veracruz.

THE NEWS AND ISOLATIONISM

These pages furnish a fascinating glimpse of the mentality and interests of the time. The news was presented in a manner very different from that of today. Sometimes the headlined story of a battle has a small addendum entitled "Later and Better News." But the reader had a good idea of what was going on, at home and abroad, and though the United States did not feel or function as a great power, burdened by the responsibility of world leadership, it was not isolationist in its interests.

The point is that a nation cannot be isolationist if it has the means to see the world as it is. The news, if faithfully reported, is the world as it is, and that reality is the only solid base of policy. This puts a terrible responsibility on any newspaper and a heavy load of new year or new century resolutions on those who have anything to do with starting this newspaper on its second hundred years.

Amendment of Railway Labor Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK W. BOYKIN
OF ALABAMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. BOYKIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

LOUISVILLE, KY., December 26, 1950.
Hon. FRANK W. BOYKIN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: As an Alabamian transferred here from Birmingham, Ala., and district chairman of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks representing 257 such transferred members, I am appealing to you as a southerner to vote and exert your influence against H. R. 7789, which would amend the Railway Labor Act to permit negotiations for a union shop on the railroads. While I and my coworkers here on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad believe in the necessity for unions, as our voluntary membership proves, we do not believe in forced membership in either a union, club, lodge, church, or anything else, feeling that such in any form is un-American and should be left to Russia.

This legislation is being sought by the national leaders, and the opinion of the people has not been asked for nor considered. They seek such power to further their political ideas, which for the greater part are of the FEPC and other civil-rights programs of the North and East variety and which, through the courage and tenacity of loyal Southern representatives, have been thus far defeated. This is evidenced by the avalanche of propaganda with which we have been plagued for the past 4 to 6 years through the papers of the organizations.

Food for thought is that at present there are over 300,000 members of the railway clerks alone, and with the passage of this bill there would be added some 60,000 forced members. With the power to assess each of these members, and the law as written allows this, even as small amount as $5 each, it is easy to see what a powerful force these leaders would have to force the passage of all of the objectionable civil-rights and other socialistic programs. This one feature alone is sufficient to warn any southerner to fight it in every way.

We as railroad employees have made great progress by expression of the freedom of choice and the Railway Labor Act. Keep this act intact as it is and let us continue to do so, but, either progress or failure, let it be as free men and not by orders under force from a few. Help us preserve this freedom.

Yours very truly,

W. T. HARRISON.

Greet 1951 Courageously

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the December 29, 1950, Lake City Reporter, which makes a timely plea for unity and courage on the part of all Americans:

GREET 1951 COURAGEOUSLY

As the new year approaches, with 1951 just around the corner, men and women have a natural tendency to review the past and look ahead while they condition future plans to what they think is in store for them.

In the present condition of world affairs, it is natural for us to be concerned about the possibility of war. Military experts, as a general rule, do not believe that the Russians plan a great war in the next 12 months. Nevertheless, the man in the street knows that the experts are sometimes wrong and are a bit apprehensive that the ambitions of the Soviet will lead to aggression. This, we know, will mean another world war.

There is nothing much that the average reader of the Lake City Reporter can do about the world situation. Of course, we are resolved to support our own government and the free peoples of the world. Regardless of cost, collectively or individually, we will stand up and fight for our civilization which, we know, has presented us with great blessings without which modern life would be a burden and individuals would become slaves.

It might be a good idea for us, as individuals, as we realize our impotency in the face of titanic forces, to resolve to make ourselves more efficient persons and thus more competent for whatever comes to hand. In the process, we should not overlook the spiritual and mental side of the human existence, nor concentrate unduly upon the physical. Man is a balanced composition of faculties not yet completely understood, but nevertheless capable of harmonious blending in the making of good men and women.

The Lake City Reporter cannot guarantee that 1951 will be happy or prosperous but we can say, without qualifications, that if the people of Columbia County, along with the rest of the population of the United States, act intelligently, unselfishly and in unity, there is no peril ahead that cannot be mastered.

We must stand together as we stand losses, experience tragedy and bear grief. This is no day for selfish behavior and greedy goals. Let us live together with stout hearts, alert minds and unconquerable spirit—there will be no fate that we cannot conquer.

Did the A-Bomb Do Any Good?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article which appeared in the January 1951 issue of the American Legion magazine, entitled "Did the A-Bomb Do Any Good?":

DID THE A-BOMB DO ANY GOOD?
(By Gretta Palmer)

Where were you on the evening of August 6, 1945? Where were you when you heard the news from Hiroshima?

It is a question every American old enough to hear the radio 5 years ago can answer. Where were you when the A-bomb dropped?

Recently, in a New York hotel room, two men met for the first time. To the question "Where were you on the morning of August 6?" they had the same answer to make:

"Hiroshima. In the plane that dropped the bomb," said Capt. Robert A. Lewis, copilot of the historic B-29, the Enola Gay.

"Hiroshima. Breakfasting in the rectory of our church," said Father Hubert F. Schiffer, S. J., one of the few European victims of the bomb.

"For 5 years I have looked forward to meeting someone who saw it from the ground," said Captain Lewis.

"I have wanted for 5 years to meet someone who was in the plane," said Father Schiffer, a German Jesuit priest so badly injured by the explosion that he was able to leave his sickbed only after many months.

"And you are all right now?" the American captain asked.

"Oh, there are 10 or 15 radioactive glass splinters in my back they still don't dare remove," the young priest shrugged. "Don't let that worry you."

"Well," said the pilot, "it doesn't make me feel too good."

The two men whose fates were so oddly linked are both in their early thirties. The priest is here studying labor relations at Fordham University, preparing for his return to mission work in Japan. Robert Lewis is personnel manager of Henry Heide, Inc., the New York candy firm. Both, then, are in the field of labor and its relations. Both of them have also strong convictions as to the need of peace in the world today, and both hope that the bomb itself will prove an instrument for bringing the dread of war so close to statesmen's hearts that peace will be assured.

But the two survivors of Hiroshima share smaller and more intimate memories. That odd taste when the bomb went off, for instance. Neither of them could describe it; neither of them had found anyone else who shared that memory until now. And they had other things to talk about.

Captain Lewis had prepared for the Hiroshima drop for years; since September of 1944, when he was secretly alerted for the biggest project the Air Force will have to do and was briefed at a hush-hush conference in Utah, on how to fly a bomb which the Army officials expected to end the war. The captain, even then, was an expert on the new B-29's, which he had been test-piloting for many months, along with his commander, Col. Paul Tibbets. Captain Lewis met with scientists who told him of the mystic symbols U235 when only a handful of high Government officials knew what they meant. He was trained to drop the bomb before the bomb was even made.

The preparations for the historic flight began in Wendover, Utah, at a flying field whose security precautions were almost neurotic in their exactitude. The town chosen had more Army intelligence men in residence than its peacetime citizens (only 100 men and women, bewildered to know what on earth was going on). No more than two atomic scientists were allowed out of Wendover on any of the experimental flights; certain scientists were judged so valuable they could never fly at all. When secret flights were made—to Los Alamos, N. Mex., certain Air Force officers wore false insignia and took a roundabout route to and from the towns they visited.

The Five Hundred and Ninth Composite Group was the hush-hush outfit's final name; it was activated in December of 1944, trained in Cuba and California. The ship herself came from the factory labelled 6292, but was given the more glamorous name of Enola Gay on her fateful mission.

So Captain Lewis had a pretty good idea of what he was going to be doing early in August of that year. "There were times," he said, "when I wanted to go back to Piper cubs. The scientists couldn't tell us whether the bomb dropping would explode the plane or not. They thought a safe distance would be 3½ miles away. Half of them—only half—expected the crew to survive."

Where was President Truman on August 6? He had just left Potsdam where he had been in conference with Marshal Stalin, Prime Minister Winston Churchill, and later, Clement Attlee. The President wanted the Potsdam warning to Japan to be dramatized by the dropping of the bomb on August 2. Weather conditions caused 4 days' delay. But every morning for those 4 days the crew of 12 men were alerted at dawn; every day until the 6th the weather closed down. On that morning, however, the skies were clear. The operations officers reported good conditions ahead. The big flight was on.

There were three planes in the group that took off at 3 a. m. that day; the bomb ship, an instrument plane, and a photographic plane which followed them several miles behind. The planes arranged to rendezvous at Iwo Jima, where a substitute plane was awaiting in case trouble should develop en route. Three weather ships had taken off an hour ahead to scout the three targets chosen as possibilities: Nagasaki, Kokura, and Hiroshima. They reported only 40 minutes before the "bombs away" that the weather was best around Hiroshima. It was that slight matter of air currents and wind that thus determined the destiny of 400,000 people—including Father Schiffer.

The priest's preparation for the event of August 6 had been a great deal less elaborate than the captain's: He expected just another day. A German-born missionary, he had been studying in Tokyo since 1935 and had only recently been ordained. The living conditions in Tokyo at that time were difficult; nightly bombings made sleep a near impossibility and the young priest was sent, by his superiors, to the quiet town of Hiroshima for a rest. Here he was to work at the Jesuit Church of the Assumption of Our Lady.

On the morning of August 6, Father Schiffer was quietly reading a Japanese newspaper at his breakfast table when the world went white about him.

("It happened that way up above, too," said Captain Lewis. "The glare when the bomb burst was so brilliant it made the sun seem pale.")

The next thing the young priest knew he was lying down, recovering consciousness and very wet from his own blood. He could neither see nor hear. That frightened him, for in a bombing such as he had known before, there should have been much noise. Then he realized that he was deaf, and also that he was blind.

A few moments later, his senses returned and he gasped at what he saw. The walls, the windows, has been shattered into strange, irregular designs. The furnishings of the room had crumbled to dust. His own clothing had been swept away. His feet were bare. And he was in great pain.

A voice from above, the voice of his pastor called to ask, "Father Schiffer, are you living?" (It was an odd question, he thought, even then: "He would ask if I were wounded unless he half expected me to be dead.")

The pastor and two other priests, who had been upstairs, rushed down to join the gravely injured man. No one understood yet what had occurred. The rectory was earthquake proof, and its walls held. But the church next door had utterly disappeared. And as for the town—

"There is a doctor down that street," the pastor said, and then his voice was still. There was no street. There was scarcely any city. There were only the horrible sights of ruination where men had lived their lives a few hours before.

Father Schiffer was obviously going to die; the pastor spoke accordingly.

"You will soon see the Blessed Mother in Heaven," he told him. "Please tell her that we will rebuild her church on this spot as soon as we can."

Father Schiffer moved a bit.

"Father," he said to his superior, "I think I have a chance of life if I can crawl to the river and get some water. You may be able to give the message to the Blessed Mother before I do."

So he set out for the river. A few hundred yards from the rectory he collapsed and lay there for 12 hours—until help could be brought from the Jesuit novitiate 3 miles outside the town. Then the wounded man was put into a hand cart and jounced over the rutted roads for an agonizing trip. At the novitiate there were no doctors, no nurses. It was the rector who looked at Father Schiffer's back and said, "Why, man, you're full of glass!" Over a hundred glass splinters had lodged in his back, and these the rector cut out, without anesthesia or proper surgical instruments.

That night more than a hundred Japanese patients were also brought to the novitiate, one by one. Some of them were kept as patients for a year or more, and fed out of the Jesuits' own scanty wartime rations. Some of them had been picked up and added to the hand-cart caravan that brought the priest himself.

"Half a dozen times on that ride," he said, "I begged the bearers, 'Let me die here. It's hopeless.' They answered, 'No. We have orders to get you back for a decent Christian funeral. If we leave you here you'll be mixed up with all the other corpses.' The other corpses were all around us where the road should have been.

"I know now," the priest added gravely, "quite enough about what hell looks like to make my meditations on that subject with no prompting from the spiritual books."

All these details of the effects on the earth below were a secret from the Americans in the B-29 until last month, when the meeting between the two men occurred. Captain Lewis has a vivid memory of all that happened in the air after the target was reached, after the "bombs away."

"Then," the captain recalls, "we made a sharp turn to the right, as the scientists had warned us to. We were flying manually by instruments at above 30,000 feet. Forty-three seconds after we had dropped it, the A-bomb exploded, 1,800 feet above the ground. My God, I felt a flash through my whole body * * * the scientists later said it was the ozone effect. Then there were two distinct slaps at the ship about 20 seconds after the flash.

"The light was at my back, but even so it stunned me. It was fiercer than the sun on that bright and sunny day. Yet by that time we were maybe 8 miles from the explosion. We had to get away fast to avoid the bomb effects ourselves. But later we could look back and see the mushroom.

"It looked as if the whole city were covered with boiling smoke. In 3 minutes it got up as high as 30,000 feet. We could see the flames below crawling up the mountains and covering the bridges and tributary rivers. It seemed impossible to comprehend.

"I thought, 'My God, what have we done? If I live a hundred years, I'll never be able to get this moment out of my mind.' I guess I never will. We thought the Japanese might have surrendered by the time we got back to our base. It seemed like something out of Buck Rogers.

"Oh, I had dropped bombs before—10,000-pound bombs. But at 30,000 feet they make tiny little puffs of smoke when they explode. This was different. This was awful. Back at the base I slept for 20 hours. But later I didn't sleep much. I'd lie awake thinking, 'What if the bomb had gone off in the plane? What if we had lost a wing?' Only half the scientists ever expected the crew to survive, remember. Yet none of us had even combat fatigue. It was a small sacrifice to end a war—on the winners' part, anyway. Nobody connected with the bomb had to lose his life.

"But, of course, the loss of life in that city was terrible. We had picked it because it was an important Japanese headquarters—the second imperial command was there."

"Yes," said Father Schiffer gently. "But that was just on paper. Hiroshima was a debarkation point for China, with about 100,000 Japanese soldiers stationed there. But there were no big military installations. It was a city of 400,000 civilians; of those at least 200,000 died."

"Good heavens," said Captain Lewis, "that many?"

"Yes," replied the priest. "The Japanese official figures minimized the loss at the ridiculous figure of 80,000. We knew better."

The pilot nodded. "I could see trolleys and little bridges going up—I don't know how many."

"Forty-two bridges were destroyed," said Father Schiffer.

"Did you hear the bomb coming down?"

"I heard nothing," Father Schiffer replied, "not the plane, nor any impact. That scared me most when I recovered consciousness. I lay there waiting for the next bombs to drop, the way they always had in raids before. The silence was the most appalling thing of all—no screams, no air-raid signals, no fire engines rushing past."

"Did you have any sensation of heat?"

"I don't remember—anyway, it was a very hot day. But when I regained my sight, I looked about and tried to count the fires—there are always fires in those wooden cities of Japan. I counted 16 in the first 10 minutes. By that time it had become very cloudy, but I didn't look up or see the mushroom.

"There was too much to hold my eyes to the earth—blood in the streets and flattened houses with no living men about. It didn't look nice."

"I went back to Japan after the war," said Captain Lewis, "and the Japs in Tokyo had the damnedest reaction to the bomb you ever heard. They seemed grateful for it. They called it 'God's wind' and said it had saved many lives by bringing an end to the war."

Father Schiffer nodded.

"I know," he said. "We thought we knew the Japanese psychology well after 15 years, but their reaction at Hiroshima amazed even us. The survivors there felt their city had been given a unique honor—that of suffering in order to bring peace to the world. They look upon their 200,000 dead as willing victims—as heroes sacrificed for world-wide peace."

"Were the survivors themselves crippled by radioactivity?"

"No," said Father Schiffer, "not unless they had had specific injuries. Many Hiroshima citizens were bald, some for years, but now their hair has been restored. There was no sterility effect, according to the doctors on the spot, and no increase in the birth of abnormal babies.

"The survivors of Hiroshima are scarcely worse off physically today than before the bomb.

"Spiritually, they are far, far better."

"And what do you mean by that, Father?" asked Captain Lewis.

"Well," said the priest, "it is a happy ending. I'll tell you.

"The Japanese Diet has allotted funds to build a University of Hiroshima as a symbol of peace. That in itself is startling. But much more than that is going on.

"Our missionaries there were recently approached by a committee of leading citizens—Buddhists, for the most part. Before the war this city was predominantly Buddhist. Well, these men approached our rector and asked if we would build a 'palace of prayer' for peace right where the A-bomb fell. He was also asked if he would supply lecturers to speak in Buddhist monasteries nearby. Conversions to Christianity are soaring and the 'palace of prayer' is to be built."

The Tokyo newspaper Asahi recently conducted a contest among architects for the best plans for this memorial shrine, and some of Japan's foremost architects competed for the honor of designing the structure. Construction should be under way by the time this article is in print.

Flags of all the countries engaged in World War II will be placed on the altar and prayers will be offered up 24 hours a day, not only for the future peace of the world but for all the dead and wounded of the war. Names of Buddhist, Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish veterans are already being inscribed in a Golden Book of Prayer which the Franciscan Adoration Monastery of Cleveland is preparing for the shrine, scheduled for completion on August 15, 1952, to coincide with the Feast of the Assumption.

Already Father Schiffer has built an orphanage at Hiroshima where 65 children are being cared for, and this is to be expanded to a general hospital in time.

And so the effects of the A-bomb on Hiroshima have included things that never crossed the minds of the General Staff in Washington nor of the scientists who discovered how to release the devil that uranium contains, nor certainly of the B-29 crew. For peace and love and prayer will mark the spot forever where the A-bomb fell.

"Will you fly back to Hiroshima when we open our shrine, Captain?" asked the priest gently. "Will you try to borrow a B-29 and land it at the spot you saw go up in smoke before?"

"Will I?" said Captain Lewis. "Will I? If I can do that, and maybe bring a plane-load of candy from America for those kids, I'll never have nightmares again over the damage that we had to do that day. I'll agree with you, the story of Hiroshima had a happy ending."

The New Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to wish for my colleagues in this House and for the Members of the other body all that is good in this new year.

The old year has taken its place with yesterday's 10,000 years. Its record is there for all to read, filled with human aspirations and spotted with mistakes of judgment and of action caused by misunderstanding as well as by apathy toward and ignorance of the great fundamental laws of God's universe.

Yes, we have made many mistakes. But I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is by mistakes that the individual and the Nation learns and grows. Therefore I do not look into this new year and the incoming Eighty-second Congress with fear and trepidation. Rather do I look forward to a year of great growth in perception, in awareness, in understanding. With such growth we can anticipate a year of fundamental accomplishment.

There is no question but that we face an era of great strain—a time when disciplines will be expected of us as individuals, as a Government and as a Nation. To see clearly we must set aside greed, selfishness, coldness of heart and emotionalism. We must recognize our own need of calm, balanced judgment in all things, of quiet determination to "seek first the kingdom of heaven, which is righteousness and peace." We must sacrifice prejudice, intolerance and fear upon the altar of our country's need for unity in unselfish service to those things which under God can bring peace in our time.

Above all else, Mr. Speaker, we as a Congress need to examine ourselves and the uncharted sea that lies ahead. We must insist upon knowing the goal toward which this Government, in its three parts, is moving at every point. We must know what each step we take involves, and what it may lead to before we take it. We must assume in completeness the responsibility placed upon us as the representatives of the people of these United States.

Only when we know our goal can we legislate with judgment and intelligence. Only when we so consider the grave matters that will come before us daily shall we have the renewed confidence of the people whom we serve. Only such confidence can give us the unity which will make us invincible.

I therefore extend to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the Members of this and the other body my good wishes for a most satisfying and constructive new year. I would ask you to join with me in all good wishes to those who share our responsibilities to the country and to the world in the other two departments of Government. It is for us to renew our covenant of freedom in unity of thought and action to preserve for future generations the freedom under law which responsible citizens of this representative Republic have had entrusted to their watchful care.

And may the Infinite grant us vision, singleness of purpose and a flaming faith in the ultimate victory of light.

Shall We Call Politburo's World War Bluff Now?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth Club of California is a unique institution. It is a club that seriously studies public questions, and after exhaustive study and discussion of a specific public problem, it makes a recommendation concerning the problem. I believe the slogan of the founder, Edward F. Adams, was "Get the facts."

Also the club attracts as guests, speakers with profound knowledge and big reputations. Since the club was founded, every President of the United States, either before or during his service as President, has addressed the members.

Leaders in practically every field of human endeavor and thought have appeared before this club as guest speakers. Recently the club was addressed by Dr. Robert J. Kerner, Sather professor of history and director of the Institute of Slavic Studies, University of California. He made a powerful address answering the question which is the title of this discussion. Whether we agree with his conclusions and analyses or not, his thoughts are well worth pondering. He has devoted years to a study and examination of our relations with Russia and the problem as to whether the world can attain stable and enduring peace so long as Russia remains Communist.

Two World Wars have been fought and won by the free world, and in each case the hope and the expectation were that world peace would follow. It was lost in 1920 when the United States refused to become a member of the League of Nations. Whether it would have brought peace, no one knows, but I am one of those that thought it was a chance we should not have overlooked.

This time the free countries started early to lay the foundation for a world order that would bring world peace. The United Nations was founded and for 5 years has been struggling to move toward a peaceful world.

Of course, we must admit that we made one terribly bad assumption; i. e., that the free world,. and the United States in particular, could work and deal with the Soviets in the same fair, frank, and honest manner that we dealt with other countries not under Soviet domination. We soon found this assumption to be false. Perhaps we of the United States should have realized this from the treatment Russia gave our lend-lease representative and our Ambassador in Russia during the war when we were fighting together as allies and when Russia was struggling desperately for her existence.

The speech of Professor Kerner is so thought provoking, so well reasoned and sweeping in its analysis that I sincerely hope it will be read by every Member of Congress. These are the kinds of discussions that really help Congressmen understand some of the staggering decisions they must soon make. Understanding and courage is what brings right decisions. The safety and freedom of this and future generations is at stake in many of the congressional decisions which will be made in the Eighty-second Congress.

Under leave granted me, I here reproduce Dr. Kerner's speech:

The Western Powers offered Russia an enduring peace on the basis of national and vital interests, in other words, real security.

The concessions made at Tehran in 1943 and at Yalta, Potsdam, and Moscow in 1945 were all made with this in view. They were President Roosevelt's great gamble, which we now know has ended in miserable failure, because, after obtaining all these concessions, the Soviet Union embarked on a policy of world revolution after the Conference at Yalta in February 1945.

This change in Soviet policy ended the hope of postwar cooperation and peace.

The Western Powers conceded that the Soviet Union had the right to friendly neighbors with governments of their choosing and with whom it would make alliances.

The new Russo-Polish boundary that it demanded was granted and the Polish Government-in-exile dropped. The Communist-controlled government of Poland was recognized.

DEFENSIVE CONCESSIONS CAN BE USED OFFENSIVELY

The German East Prussian territory around Koenigsberg, which would prevent a new Germany from threatening Moscow, Leningrad, and the eastern Baltic by air, was likewise assigned to Soviet Russia. In Russian hands this grant of territory, for defensive purposes can be turned into an offensive base to dominate Berlin, Paris and Copenhagen with the entrance to the Baltic, if not London itself.

The award of Bessarabia and Bukowina, if used for defensive purposes by Russia, protects Odessa and blocks an invasion route into the Russian Ukraine. If used for offensive purposes and aggression, it dominates the Danube, and constitutes a gateway to conquest of the Balkans.

Soviet Russia's demand for a new treaty to regulate the Turkish Straits was accompanied by the abrogation in March 1945 of its treaty of virtual alliance with Turkey dating back 20 years. The Western Powers conceded that new conditions called for a new treaty, but insisted on an international arrangement, which would not permit Russian domination of the very strategic waterway.

The Western Powers promised Soviet Russia the Kurile Islands. By this concession the Soviet Union secured a Russian-controlled access into the North Pacific, which if used offensively might lead to the domination of the North Pacific and put the Aleutians, Alaska, and Canada in jeopardy.

Add to this, previously held railroad, economic and naval rights in Manchuria acquired before 1905, the right-of-way to create an independent Mongolia, and the right to occupy Korea north of the thirty-eighth parallel. Looked at defensively, this would secure Russia access to unfrozen ports and to perfect defense of its Asiatic shores.

From an offensive point of view, Mongolia, a Buddhist country, closely connected in religion with Tibet and with millions of believers in China, India, and elsewhere, could serve as an excellent gateway for the world revolution steam roller in this backyard of Asia.

MANCHURIA USED AS RED CHINA BASE

To use Manchuria, the one great potential basis of China's future industrialization, as a stepping stone to the triumph of Chinese Communists in all China, as it was actually used, is a world-revolutionary action.

The Western Powers also conceded the ominous principle of coalition (bourgeois-Communist) governments in the Soviet Union's neighbors: Poland, Eastern Germany, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, and China—everyone, except Yugoslavia, a neighbor. This meant delivering these countries to Moscow; submission to Moscow.

Full status in the United Nations, with three votes in the Assembly and a permanent seat in the Security Council with power to veto anything remotely in opposition to the progress of the world revolution, followed logically.

IF POLICY PEACE, CONCESSIONS SATISFACTORY

Occupation zones in Germany (with Berlin territorially unconnected with the non-Soviet sectors), and in Austria, with vague and undefined and unagreed upon arrangements of reparations from them for the Soviet Union, gave further great advantages.

Any country whose policy was security, defense, and peace based on national and vital interests would have regarded these concessions as satisfactory.

In spite of all these concessions and a world disarmed outside the Soviet Union, there has been a persistent whine, as if some rank injustice had been done to that country.

Communist propaganda harped upon the warlike world surrounding it, with first Britain and now the United States ready to pounce on such an innocent and wronged community of peace-loving citizens as the Soviet Union and its satellites.

SOME CITIZENS AND SCHOLARS SWALLOWED BAIT

And this, some well-intentioned citizens and scholars, and some not so well-intentioned, have swallowed bait, fishhook, sinker, line and pole.

The competent historian in the future will charge that the Soviet Union, more properly the Moscow Politburo, wrecked the hopes of peace beginning in 1945 and will name it as the aggressor in China and Korea, as it was in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Greece and Bulgaria and as the instigator of the third world war, if and when it unfortunately begins.

This leads to another misapprehension, that Soviet imperialism is nothing else than czarist imperialism, and that the Russian people are, therefore, our enemies. This would lead us to the same mistake Hitler made.

Russian soldiers surrendered in millions to the Germans. They wanted to be liberated. They were treated as despised enemies, as so many swine.

This is one of the most important factors, if not the most important, that saved Communist rule in Russia.

CZARS DID NOT SUPPORT SUBVERSION ABROAD

Czarist Russia expanded down the rivers in search of access to the seas.

Czarist Russia followed preponderantly the policy of national and vital needs. It did not create, direct, and support political parties, in all the other countries to bring about its domination of them.

It is time we return to the view that, should the third world war unfortunately break out, the peoples of Russia will take an enthusiastic part in their own liberation.

The Soviet Empire and its colonies, we must conclude, is basically a far different organism from that of czarist Russia and has a world revolutionary policy, not one of security and national and vital aims.

The Soviet empire and its colonies have a great superiority at present in armed might as respects trained and battle-ready divisions, some 175 at least, in certain kinds of artillery and tanks, in hedge-hopping airplanes, and possible in snorkel submarines. It may have some atom bombs.

It is fatally vulnerable from air attack in its Baku and Ploesti oil fields, in some of its industrial concentrations, in its very inadequate railroad system and in the forced, superficial loyalty of its peoples.

Do you wonder then that the Moscow Politburo has thus far avoided international war but, as Secretary Acheson said, attempts to overthrow by subversive means established governments.

SOVIET PURPOSE TO BLUFF, TERRORIZE

Their purpose is clear: to bluff and terrorize the free world into further fatal appeasements, to soften it for easy conquest, to lull it to sleep with a false peace movement, whose sole objective is to eliminate the one weapon—the atom bomb—that really frightens the war lords of the Kremlin.

By bluff, terror, and pressure on the part of the Soviet bloc and by exported revolutionaries—the Bolshevik termites—they are confident they can finish the Communist conquest of the world without taking the risk, perhaps fatal to them, of international war. At least not until they have so nibbled away at the world, until the rest is isolated and worn out and will be a push-over by a safe use of force from without.

STALIN, LENIN: WAR INEVITABLE

At that time, if they have to, they will resort to the preventive war which Voznesensky let out of the bag in his The War Economy of the USSR: "To prevent the possibility of appearance within the near future of new imperialist aggression against the Socialist homeland at the beginning of a third world war, it is necessary that the aggressor imperialist countries be disarmed, militarily and economically, and that the anti-imperialist countries rally together."

In this light Stalin's statement in 1927 is understandable: "We cannot forget the saying of Lenin to the effect that a great deal in the matter of our construction depends whether we succeed in delaying war with the capitalist countries, which is inevitable, but which may be delayed either until proletarian revolt ripens in Europe or until the colonial revolutions come fully to a head, or finally until the capitalists fight among themselves over division of the colonies."

In recent history the attempt to limit wars to local wars has been a failure.

TRIED TO FENCE OFF FORMOSA

We have tried to call the United Nations action in Korea a local police action. We have tried to limit it to Korea, fencing Formosa out of it and hoping that Communist China would also stay out of it.

Thus England is friendly at Peiping and in Hong Kong where it sells materials useful in war to Chinese Communists. Our merchants and ships until recently did the same thing. British boys are fighting Chinese Communists in Korea.

How much sense does this make?

Question: "Are the limitations which prevent unlimited pursuit of Chinese large forces and unlimited attack on their bases regarded by you as a handicap to effective military operations?" Answer by General MacArthur: "An enormous handicap, without precedent in military history."

The Truman-Attlee conversations must have pleased Stalin and Mao, but they pleased hardly anybody competent to judge such matters. We yielded on the British suggestion to see what can be done to bring about peace in Korea. We continued our stand on Formosa.

We continued post haste to arm, mobilize, and create a war economy. We will continue to believe that anything obtained in that way in Korea is only a truce.

HAVE HELD TO ONE-FRONT POLICY

We have held to the one-front policy which the Moscow Politburo could easily diagnose from public statements, to wit: Europe is more important than Asia.

This is sound so far as the statement that, if Europe goes down, we are isolated. It is unsound in that the problem of Communist aggression is world-wide and must be met on all fronts.

There is sufficient evidence available to take the ground that Stalin at this time—we cannot say the same for a year or two hence—cannot fight except on one front.

To support, equip, and provide for the Northern Korea and Chinese Communist forces at such a great distance from Moscow has been quite a strain for Soviet Russian economy. Stalin would not welcome an all-front war at this time.

WILL WE BE RELATIVELY STRONGER IN 1952?

Will we be relatively stronger than Stalin in 1951 or 1952 than we are now? Was Britain stronger relatively than Hitler in 1939 than in 1936? Was Stalin relatively stronger than Hitler in 1941 than he was in 1939? The answer to these is most probably not in the affirmative.

Competent research blames the outbreak of the First World War on the fact that the British did not make it clear enough and soon enough to William II that they would enter the war.

British appeasements led definitely to the Second World War. In reality, though denied by Mr. Attlee, has not his recent attempt resembled (earlier appeasements)?

MORE LOCAL WARS

For Mr. Stalin it means the Western World is weak—a triumphant local war in Korea can be duplicated in Indochina, Siam, Burma, India, and most of all in Iran (if it is necessary to go that far).

All these are outside the Atlantic Pact.

Attlee-led Europe and Nehru-led Asia present a tempting, but deceptive dish to Stalin. Tempting for further forays, deceptive finally, because they will come to a true realization of the situation sooner or later and then the die will be cast.

These conversations will not prevent a third world war. They may even hasten it. The situation has become a race in time. How much has it advanced the timetable? To 1951?

If we called Stalin's bluff, knowing he cannot fight an all-front war now, there is just a chance that this might prevent such a war.

If it did not, it would not be the cause of the war because all the causes of the war have been counted in by this time by competent judges.

Only Stalin can prevent the third world war, but his terms are submission to Moscow. The free nations, free men everywhere cannot accept submission to Moscow, and what is more they will accept only an enduring peace or go down to ruin trying to get it.

Who blocked agreement on the use of the atom bomb which required efficient international inspection? Who prevented the creation of armed forces for the United Nations to block such forays as Korea and those yet to come?

Who? Who? Who?

Who put pressure upon and converted the governments of Eastern Europe into Soviet vassals? Who almost scuttled the democratic governments of France and Italy?

Who fooled our advisers about China? Who ordered the Northern Koreans into south China? Who ordered the Chinese Communist divisions into Korea after the defeat of the Northern Koreans?

Who will order the next subtle pressure and force into Indochina, Iran, or some other locale? The answer is the same: The Moscow Politburo.

The next step, after the real failure to solve the Korean war which may be expected, is to call Soviet Russia's and Communist China's bluff on a world war.

Neither they nor we are prepared for it. But they have a lot more to lose from an international war than we. You will be surprised at the result.

It will give the world its first chance to look peace in the face since 1945. If it brings war now, we shall win that war and end the menace to freedom.

Forgotten Man in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Washington Daily News of January 1, 1951, and the first of three articles by Clyde Farnsworth on the remarkable record of resistance which the Government of the Republic of China has made both to Japanese and armed Communists attempts to conquer and use China for their respective program of world domination. Little by little, events are discrediting those who were apologists for Chinese Communists and detractors of the Chinese Government. Perhaps the truth about China can soon be given a hearing again in this country. Only then will there be hope that public pressure will force the American Government to alter its disastrous policies of the last 5 years in Asia and thereby perhaps save our own country:

FORGOTTEN MAN

It is ironical that, at a time when the Communists are threatening to conquer all of Asia, the Asiatic who was first to draw his sword against communism is not permitted to fight.

It is just as ironical that, when we are losing a war against communism in Korea for want of manpower, a well-trained army, ready and eager to fight and within easy sailing distance of the front, has not been called on.

Chiang Kai-shek is the man. The army is the huge Chinese Nationalist force now idle on Formosa.

Politics is keeping both out of the war.

Chiang fought and won countless battles against the Reds before 1937 when he was forced to devote his major attention to the Japanese. Against the Japanese, Chiang lost more battles than he won. But he kept on fighting. After Japan surrendered to the Allies in 1945, the Nationalists resumed their war with the Communists.

Chiang lost the support of the United States Government because he refused to make a deal with the Communists.

Some of the details of this amazing story are told by Scripps-Howard staff writer Clyde Farnsworth on this page today.

As a war correspondent, Mr. Farnsworth was a witness to many of these events. Today's article and two more to follow will make it easier to understand why the Communists are winning the war in Asia.

CHIANG'S FOUGHT REDS 25 YEARS

(NOTE.—This is the first of three articles by Clyde Farnsworth answering the question raised in some quarters as to whether the Chinese Nationalists can and will fight. Mr. Farnsworth returned to this country recently from an 8-year tour of duty in the Orient.)

(By Clyde Farnsworth)

Chiang Kai-shek and his armed forces have fought Russian-inspired, Russian-directed world revolution for 25 years.

It was not, of course, a constant clash of arms and shedding of blood. There were periods of armed truce, of recession, or advance, times in which the two sides tried their luck at the council tables. And for eight long years the Chinese Nationalists were preoccupied with their war of resistance against Japan.

But the undercurrents of conflict between the strongest Communist Party outside Russia and the strongest Asiatic force ever brought to bear against world communism were never stilled—from the death of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, whom Chiang succeeded, down to today.

The record shows—and I know from personal experience—that the Chinese Nationalists fought, and often fought well, with the odds desperately against them. And they're ready and eager to go again. It's only a sordid twist of international politics that keeps them out of the war we're in. They would, of course, be on our side.

The Chiang-Nationalists' struggle with communism falls into three periods:

Chiang first purged his government party of Russian and Chinese Communists. He then conducted a successful military campaign against Chinese war lords, brought China greater unification than the country had ever known, eliminated a "Chinese Soviet Republic" in southeast China and harried its army for 6,000 roundabout miles into the Chinese northwest.

Chiang's 1930 offensive was the first of six. The Reds held pronounced terrain advantages in mountain fastnesses.

The Nationalist-Communist struggle of 1930 to 1934 was a war of complete mobility. It was then the Chinese Red leaders developed a new manual of guerrilla tactics, including unparalleled terror against civil populations that aided the Nationalists.

The sharpest statistics on record to show that this was bloody warfare and not an old-fashioned Chinese tempest over teacups—that it produced a Nationalist victory and Red retreat—are the before-and-after population figures in the province where most of the fighting occurred.

The 25,000,000 population of Kiangsi Province was cut in half.

The sixth and final offensive against the outnumbered Reds in 1934 developed into a vast ring around the Kiangsi enclave. Between 90,000 and 100,000 Reds broke out, and one year and 6,000 miles later they arrived in Shensi Province—20,000 strong.

In 1936 Russia obviously ordered the weakened Chinese Communists to lay off their propagandizing for an anti-Chiang, anti-Japan "united front." Russia recognized Chiang's value for the coming war against Japan and demonstrated this by saving his life in a sensational kidnaping episode.

The Japanese also had recognized the growing strength of the Chiang-Nationalist line-up. They attacked in 1937 and Chiang resisted.

Virtually cut off from outside material aid, he resisted for 8 years, exacting 1,000,000 casualties and tying up about 1,000,000 Japanese troops which otherwise could have been used to help block the American offensive in the Pacific.

This was the very minimum of the Nationalist contribution to the defeat of Japan.

During much of the same time Chiang also resisted all pressures, including those of President Roosevelt and Lt. Gen. Joseph W. Stilwell, for an integration of Chinese Communist armies with his own and with General Stilwell commanding both. Chiang felt that would be a short-cut to a Communist China.

The Communists meanwhile used the "united front" against Japanese invasion to spread themselves from the north into central and south China and to increase their army from 25,000 to more than 300,000.

Chiang fought the Japanese with one hand and tried to rule the Reds with the other.

His divisions engaged a Japanese seaborne force for 3 months around Shanghai in 1937, blocking the way to Nanking where the enemy hoped to dictate a sudden peace. By the time the Japanese reached Nanking the Government had moved to Hankow, the first of Chiang's withdrawals into the interior.

The Chinese, no match for the Japanese in arms or equipment, had to sell China's space for time in which to set up interior bases.

Yet in April 1938 the poorly armed Chinese gave the Japanese a sound beating at Taierchwang. The Japanese suffered 30,000 casualties by Chinese estimate.

It took the Japanese 4 months to crack Hankow's defenses and they never reached Chungking which was to be Chiang's provisional capital. Changsha, focus of Japanese attempts to establish a line of communications through southeast China, was successfully defended against three offensives, only to yield in 1944 to the fourth.

At Hengyang, farther south, the Japanese were held up 47 days by a Chinese garrison completely cut off from all supply except by air, one of the epic defenses of the war.

There were many other battles, attested to by American observers, and other Chinese victories, but the last Japanese campaign of the war was an attempt to knock out a Chinese-American air base at Chihkiang, western Hunan Province, ended in the most impressive victory for the Chinese, still underarmed.

They halted and finally shattered and threw back a Japanese force of 80,000 men between April 9 and June 3, 1945.

The Communists, with enormous Russian help in the way of captured Japanese arms, won the battle of China in Manchuria.

In the winter of 1947–48, Red Gen. Lin Piao had to mount seven separate offensives against the reduced, outnumbered, outgunned, and overextended Nationalists before he made the northeast a secure base for the conquest of China proper.

The Red's first major successes were Weihsien, in Shantung, and Shihchiachwang in Hopeh, neither a pushover.

The capture of Tsinan, capital of Shantung, after a 10-day battle and the first of the Nationalists' big defections, gave a decisive turn to events. Four months later Tientsin went under and Peiping was not far behind.

On the other hand, Taiyuan, capital of Shansi, closely beseiged for months, fought on and was not reduced until after Nanking had fallen in April 1949.

Peiping was yielded without a fight by Gen. Fu Tso-yi, whom American officials had touted as the best of Chiang Kai-shek's generals, while one of the worst, in their judgment, Gen. Tu-Yu-ming, fought until he was captured in the big battle of Hsuchow. That fight finally decided things north of the lower Yangtze.

About 1,000,000 combatants engaged in this, the greatest battle of China's struggle. Virtually the whole Nationalist force committed was lost between November 9 and mid-December 1948, in the Hsuchow breakthrough and its sequel of outflankings and envelopments.

The following spring, 1949, after a futility of peace-seeking, Nanking, Shanghai, and Hankow were lost, but it took the rest of the year for the Reds to win the strategic centers of south, southwest, west, and northwest China.

The Nationalists were left principally on the island of Formosa, which already had been converted into a base, for retraining of officers and men.

The Nationalists smashed a 20,000-man amphibious assault on Kinmen Island, off Amoy. They defended the Chusan Islands, southeast of Shanghai, against repeated assaults before skillfully withdrawing 100,000 troops to add to the defense of Formosa. And they extricated some of the defenders of Hainon when that island also had to be yielded for Formosa's sake.

Civilian Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLINTON D. McKINNON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. McKINNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am pleased to point out a patriotic undertaking conducted by a friend and constituent of mine in San Diego.

The Federal Government's delay in assuming adequate leadership and guidance in civilian defense has provided understandable confusion and concern upon the part of municipal officials and private citizens throughout the Nation.

Here and there we are seeing evidence of real leadership and acceptance upon the part of private citizens to take the initiative in civilian-defense organization.

One of the outstanding instances occurred a few days ago in San Diego, when Edward Longstreth, a private citizen with unbounded loyalty to our country and admirable courage in undertaking original ideas, inserted a full-page ad at his own expense in the San Diego dailies which outlined a grass-roots program for development of a workable civilian-defense organization.

Mr. Longstreth's suggestion met an overwhelming acceptance in San Diego. His telephone was swamped with congratulatory calls, his mail was flooded, he was interviewed by the press, the radio, and television, and meetings were held throughout the city to set up block organizations. His great experience again proves what we well know: that American people can be counted upon.

He is now collecting and collating the tremendous response he had to his suggestion. One reaction is already recognizable: there is apprehension among the grass roots lest block leaders be appointed from above instead of elected in the block.

People seem to feel there will be greater cooperation if our usual democratic processes are followed and the neighbors elect their own leaders—

Mr. Longstreth reports.

He is passing his findings along to proper authorities, but for the benefit of my colleagues who have manifested a sincere interest in a proper civilian-defense organization, I am reproducing herewith the copy of Mr. Longstreth's appeal:

[From the San Diego (Calif.) Union of December 19, 1950]

SAN DIEGO CAN INSPIRE NATION INTO IMMEDIATE CIVIL DEFENSE

In his proclamation of the existence of a national emergency, President Harry S. Truman spoke directly to every citizen in the following manner:

"I summon all citizens to make a united effort for the security and well-being of our beloved country and to place its needs foremost in thought and action that the full moral and material strength of the Nation may be readied for the dangers which threaten us.

"I summon every person and every community to make, with a spirit of neighborliness, whatever sacrifices are necessary for the welfare of the Nation."

In the firm and calm tones of a determined American, President Truman has prescribed the destiny of every citizen in the United States. Every American is to have a post of duty in the imminent war for the world. It will take this totality of manpower and womanpower, from young to old, to insure survival.

Our country, unprepared at this moment save for the A-bomb, is the covetous prey of a Communist clique that has thus far enslaved 800,000,000 people.

From their eastern and western strongholds, Soviet masters are now setting their greatest trap to make slaves of the 150,000,000 Americans who must, as one, prove their love of liberty by their willingness to fight and to die for it.

Before we can muster our military strength to slug it out, man to man, with the Red hordes of Russia, China, and the hammered-and-sickled satellites, American shores and cities will be dented with cruel blows and diabolical sabotage.

While our production brains tune up the industrial machinery that will someday unleash the most gigantic armor of death the world has ever known, and while our youth learn to become scientific killers, the civilian population of America must stand guard on our strategic coast lines and in our industrial cities.

America is at war with Russia, Red China and Communists the world over, including those within our own country. President Truman, speaking for all Americans, has accepted the challenge.

There will be no appeasement, no turning back. Our total war mobilization is under way. We are racing against time and time is not on our side.

We will become locked in mortal and final combat at the evil pleasure of Stalin, now approaching the end of his days, who has sworn to conquer the world in his fading lifetime.

Over our Nation—and every home in it—hangs this uncertain sword of a Red Damocles.

That it will fall—to endanger what is left of the free world—is as certain as the fact that more than one-third of the world has thus far been conquered by Russia since Stalin became the executor of the Marxist plan of world conquest only 23 years ago.

President Truman spoke calmly and soberly because he knows—as all Americans now know—that our Nation is embarking upon a perilous and unknown course which can save our Nation and free the world for a truly lasting peace—or plunge it into the abyss of final darkness.

Victory for free men will come on some distant day from out of the shambles of a smashed world. But it will come only if our civilian population stands united behind the men and women on the production line and the boys who must go away to die.

In the face of sudden attack, from out of the sky or off-shore, every city in America is defenseless today.

San Diego, an industrial heart, a prime target and a mighty seaport funnel to our men in the frozen hell of Korea, today lies vulnerable to attack, easy prey to saboteurs.

We, the civilian population of San Diego, must overnight meet the emergency. We, the civilian population, must without a second's delay, join in the mobilized march to save and to defend America. If an attack should come to San Diego tonight—forever likely until communism has been crushed—our streets would be a maelstrom of confusion, our highways bogged, our communication lines jammed and thus whatever military and police forces might be available, would be rendered impotent.

San Diego is not going to be guilty of this criminal blunder—the blunder of foreign cities in which disorganization of civilian populations contributed to the victory of Red conquerors.

San Diego can make a start toward being ready within 24 hours and by getting ready, with its civilian population, our city can and will become the first in the nation to organize all of its men, women, and children in behalf of America's all-out war effort.

The Red enemy will throw its armored fangs from out of the sky, from off-shore or from within our ranks, in a day or a night when we are least prepared. It could come at any moment; it could come while we take time out to celebrate the holidays.

San Diego's civilian population—as no other city in the Nation—can recruit itself for immediate, stand-by action against attack, invasion, or sabotage. I respectfully submit to our people that this can be done in the following manner:

Let the senior resident in every block, whether man or woman, at once, automatically and patriotically consider himself the chairman of his block. His first immediate duty should be to ask all the residents within his block, from the age of 13 and up, to meet at once for a civil-defense meeting in the living room of his home. At the initial meeting a permanent chairman for the block should be elected and discussion should take place at this charter gathering concerning what positions should be created, who will fill them, and what the duties of each shall be.

Of necessity there will be a secretary, to make detailed notes of each meeting and record the assignments and duties each person is to assume.

There will be the posts of various wardens for each city block, who will be responsible for the alarms concerning various phases of enemy warfare, such as atomic attack, invasion, and sabotage. Each living-room organization in San Diego should make certain that every resident in every block has a specific job to do from now on until the world is free.

Discussions at these meetings will determine, for example, what steps will be taken for caring for the injured; plans, if any, for evacuation; the manner in which all roads and lines of communication will be kept open; the means of combating sabotage and fires; and the protection of our water supply.

After a detailed plan has been worked out for the block, the chairman should send the recommendations of his "living-room committee" to the mayor of San Diego, the Honorable Harley E. Knox, in order that all recommendations can be studied, tabulated, and assessed by the mayor, the city council, the city manager, and the military authorities, and used as the basis of an immediate overall plan for every citizen in San Diego.

Mayor Knox and other city officials can then forward San Diego's civilian-population plan to Gov. Earl Warren, so that in turn our program can be integrated at once into the framework of our State's program to protect and save California.

San Diego, with its civilian population thus mobilized and posts of duty assigned, will not only be doing its vital part in this crucial hour but will be serving as a model for all other cities to become mobilized to the last man, woman, and child in behalf of our country.

Let us begin at once—tonight. Let us tell the world that San Diego, the city of gracious living, can also be a tough and formidable foe.

EDWARD LONGSTRETH.

LA JOLLA, CALIF.

Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALBERT M. COLE
OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. COLE of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Topeka Optimist Club, December 29, 1950:

Many people writing me from the First District are deeply troubled at the headlong pace with which we are plunging into another war. They are disturbed and angry to find that after two World Wars on foreign soil to establish peace and freedom, we are now embroiled in another conflict.

"Why are we in Korea?" they ask. "Why must our sons be sacrificed to the warmongers?" and, finally, "Why don't we stay at home and mind our own business?"

These letters touch a responsive chord in my heart. Apparently the world has learned nothing by its bitter experiences. To settle differences by the horrible destruction of lives and nations is insane and criminal, when we know that these problems could be solved by following the principles of Jesus. And so, personally, if I had my choice, America would ignore the war criminals of the world, and live at home in peace and happiness.

Can I have my choice? Can you have your choice? Can America have her choice? Or has not our choice already been taken from us by the Kremlin aggressors of Moscow? Wishful thinking will not answer these questions. Instead, we must first decide whether Russia plans a conquest of the United States. The solution of that problem is the answer to the question of peace and security.

In finding an answer we must remember that the lives and property of ourselves and our posterity are at stake.

Our homes, our farms and jobs, our cities will stand or fall.

Our freedom, our religion, and all the things we hold dear are in the balance.

Our children's lives and future are involved.

It is as simple as that. It is as terrible as that. It is the most tremendous issue the American people will face in the twentieth century.

We must not be blinded by slogans. We fought to "save the world for democracy" in World War I, and to establish the "Four Freedoms" in World War II.

Like "faith without works," however, we have found that ideals, standing alone, are not enough. The sacrifice of our men in war is too great a price to pay for impractical dreams of a better world. We must be realistic, and to be realistic we most certainly must reexamine our foreign policy.

The reexamination of our foreign policy should produce two results. First, we should know and understand our ultimate objective; second, this objective must be within our means to accomplish.

Let us not be ashamed to think first of America, of our own soldiers, of the danger to our own people, of the possibility of bleeding ourselves white in quixotic crusades.

Now, does Russia plan a conquest of the United States?

Some intelligent, patriotic people say "no." They point to Russia's membership in the United Nations, and cooperation with many of its international agencies. The Russian representatives in the United Nations have constantly referred to their desire for peace, and charged that the United States is the warmonger.

They further point to our isolated geographic position, our great Navy, Armed Forces, and unparalleled productive capacity, all of which they believe will prevent any actual attack on our shores.

Some equally intelligent and patriotic people fear Russia's aggressive plans. They point to the writings of Karl Marx, Lenin, and Stalin as blueprints of a Communist-planned world revolution. A review of the history of the Soviet Union discloses that the pattern has been closely followed.

United States Communists have been called to Moscow to receive police state training. Earl Browder and others of his ilk have returned to their homes in America to carry out Soviet orders in furtherance of world revolution. The trial of the 11 Communists in New York brought to light how these traitors are directed from the Kremlin. The same policy has been carried out in France, England, Germany, Korea, and China, as well as the other nations of the world.

Russia has maintained her wartime army and military production, while her former allies of World War II demobilized.

Russia has trained and armed a "people's army" of German youth, with which she constantly threatens our occupation forces in Germany.

These people, including our entire military, remind us that modern methods of warfare make it foolhardy for us to believe we are immune from attack and invasion.

For myself, the evidence of planned and continued Communist conquest is too plain to ignore. I am not willing to gamble the lives and freedom of our people by assuming they will not carry out their threats.

We must consider, then, how the proposed conquest would be carried out. They would do it by attempting to force us to spend ourselves into bankruptcy, by gobbling up the other nations of the world and strangling us, by fifth column internal attack, and finally, by all-out war.

What is our best defense against these attacks? We have the means within our own country to prevent bankruptcy and subversive internal attack. If our Government is threatened by either of these methods it is because of our failure to do our own housecleaning.

If our danger lies in aggressive attack, we do not have the same power to mode decisions. The strength of our enemy, and the power of our defense depend upon conditions outside the boundaries of the United States.

It has been said we can best meet this threat by withdrawing our troops from the world, refusing to be drawn into a conflict, and building up a mighty military machine here at home.

Withdrawal of our troops from Germany, Austria, and Japan would leave these countries at the mercy of the Communists. France and England would be easy victims. Asia and Europe would be overrun by the Reds, and dominated by one police state.

Huddled behind a Maginot line of our boundaries, we would give the enemy the rest of the world for bases from which to attack. We would have no place to meet him, except here at home, where we would wait for his attack on our cities and people. I prefer we should be in a position to have some choice of the area for the fighting.

The best defense is offensive action, carrying the fight to the enemy, stopping him before he reaches you. This can be done by having friends, allies, and strategic bases in other parts of the world. I am, therefore, forced to the conclusion that we must continue our occupation forces for some time to come, and work with our friends.

How can this be done? The United Nations has not proved effective as a sound base upon which to build our international security. The Marshall plan, conceived only as a postwar aid to Europe, cannot give us satisfactory military aid in return for our dollars spent. We can spend ourselves into bankruptcy and still be disappointed when our European friends are needed as fighting allies.

How then can be obtain the help we may need from other countries?

1. Secure allies through the time-tested device of convincing them of our common interests. (As allies, I would include enemies of our enemies, such as Chiang, Franco, and Tito, for as long as their interests are common with ours.)

2. Stop Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA) spending now. This aid was for economic, peacetime rehabilitation.

3. Make no loans or grants to foreign countries except on a basis of the concrete military aid that these countries can and are willing to give us in fighting our common enemies.

By this method we would eliminate phony dollar friends, save money, and get value received for expenditures. Our real friends and allies would benefit from our military aid, and not require ECA funds.

4. Cling tenaciously to the idea that war is not inevitable, but also, that peace is not inevitable.

The two World Wars taught us peace is not obtained by appeasement, or by withdrawing from the world. We tried desperately to stay at home then, not to get into entangling alliances, and to mind our own business. The hard, cold fact is that we did not do it. Now we are again faced with the problem. We must stop playing Atlas to the rest of the world. But retaining military bases and alliances are insurance against the possibility of war, and come under the head of minding our own business. Our greatest hope to save our people and property from destruction is to be in a position not to be bluffed, to be militarily strong, which includes all the help from allies we can get, and then stand firm.

Now, what about Korea?

It is my belief that the disaster we are now facing in Korea has its roots in the bungling of our foreign policy. To have fixed an imaginary boundary line between North and South Korea, originally erected for the purpose of collecting the arms of a defeated army, was stupidity. To following this error with the announcement that we would not defend Korea was an invitation to a group, admittedly bent on world domination, to move. To bear out this statement by failing to give military aid to a fledgling republic was to emboss the invitation. Thus, those responsible for the forming of our foreign policy set up the conditions for June 25.

Then the field was reversed. We jumped into the fray unprepared for a major conflict. Thus our position in Korea has been untenable militarily and politically. We did exactly the opposite of our announced policy, and failed to appraise the extent of the military commitment involved.

I have made statements that we must get out of Korea. We should get out now as quickly as possible consistent with the potential dire results which might accompany a hasty evacuation. In my judgment we were certainly in no condition to go into Korea. But now with the vast and terrible involvement of American lives, it might well be inviting overwhelming cost unless we hold the lines for the present.

We are entering a new year. Let us resolve to place our faith in God, keep our powder dry, and face the future intelligently and unafraid.

Time To Stop Talking and Play Our Ace in China

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WALTER H. JUDD
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following editorial from the Hopewell News, of Hopewell, Va. Its editor, Mr. A. Robbins, Jr., is one of the many millions of Americans who have no difficulty understanding what the Kremlin and its minions throughout the world are up to. He sees through the bald-faced lies by which the Communists accuse us and any other intended victims of the things they themselves are doing or about to do. He sees clearly the folly of imagining we can get out of our present trouble by negotiating an agreement when the other side does not and never did want agreement; its goal is world conquest. Furthermore, he and most other sensible Americans have the courage to look the hard facts in the face and do what is necessary if only their leaders would become as clear-headed and as realistic and courageous. One wonders how long our professionals, "the experts," will continue to be so befuddled by all the multitude of complicating trees that they miss the forest of what our country must do to get Communist expansion in Asia stopped, if we ourselves expect to survive. The editorial follows:

TIME TO STOP TALKING AND PLAY OUR ACE IN CHINA

It is extremely dubious that any good will come from negotiating with the Chinese Communists over the situation in Korea.

The United Nations has been talking and negotiating too long now. The resolution passed by the Political Committee and now before the UN General Assembly condemning the Chinese Red action in Korea has been watered down by changing the word "aggression" to "intervention."

The Russian delegate, Mr. Malik, made it plain in a speech to the United Nations a few days ago that a cease-fire agreement could only be reached if the UN forces were withdrawn from Korea. The Chinese Reds have insisted they must confer on a basis of equality to discuss all major far eastern questions.

Certainly the people of the United States do not wish to see the Chinese Reds granted a seat in the United Nations, with consequent admittance to the Security Council, under circumstances that would undermine the moral force of the UN and eventually wreck it just like the League of Nations was wrecked.

WILLING TO NEGOTIATE

The United States has shown its willingness to negotiate as long as there was the slightest chance of such negotiations leading to anything. But giving in to the present demands of the Chinese Reds would be a holdup of the world community at the point of a gun. It would be appeasement that would weaken the free world and put the Communist dictatorship that much further along the road to domination of the world.

The United States and the United Nations have an ace in the hole that could easily change the entire picture in Asia, and perhaps save the masses of that continent from Communist slavery, if we would only use it before it is too late.

Conditions in Red China are far from stable. Mao Tze-tung, the Red dictator, has weakened his position in many parts of that sprawling country by concentrating many of his best troops in Korea and Manchuria.

HELP NATIONALISTS

The Nationalist Government of China, still recognized by the United Nations and the United States as the legal government of China, has a large army on Formosa. Reports indicate Chiang may have as many as 400,000 fairly well trained and well equipped troops on Formosa. In addition, the Nationalists have a growing guerrilla force of over a million and a half on the mainland. They have a small air force and a small navy.

Reports from reliable correspondents who have been on Formosa and have visited the coast of China, are that with the right kind of help Chiang could land on the mainland and have a good chance of being welcomed by the people. That the guerrilla activity could be soon stepped up to give the Reds a great deal of difficulty and that a large part of South China might soon be recaptured.

Coupled with a strict blockade of Communist China, this action might soon tip the scales in Asia. It may be our last chance to save all Asia from coming under the Communist dictatorship.

ACHESON'S PROPOSAL

While Prime Minister Attlee of Great Britain was in Washing on conferring with President Truman, Secretary of State Acheson is said to have advocated a "limited war" with China. This would have involved a blockade of the coast, bombing communications in Manchuria to prevent Russia from sending supplies, and helping Chiang land on the mainland.

Apparently Mr. Acheson's proposal did not even get serious consideration, because Mr. Attlee's government has already recognized the Peiping Communist regime as the Government of China and had advocated they be seated in the United Nations in place of Nationalist China. This was said to be the only point of difference between Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman in their talks. It is a grave point for the British stand may effect the future of the world.

ATTACKED 52 NATIONS

When Mao Tze-tung sent his Red troops into Korea he attacked the United Nations. He attacked the 52 nations who had supported the resolution to stop aggression in Korea. He attacked the 12 nations who have sent men, equipment, planes or ships to the United Nations forces in Korea. Yet the United Nations talks and tries to negotiate.

It reminds us of the time the United States forced Chiang to talk and negotiate with the Chinese Reds. At the end of 1945 the Nationalists just about had the Reds licked. They had captured the Communist capital at Yenan and even had them cut off from the Japanese military supplies the Soviets had captured in Manchuria and were ready to turn over to the Chinese Communists, in violation of treaties and agreements.

So the United States stepped in and ordered a cease fire. Each army was to retain its position at the moment, while Chiang and Mao negotiated a settlement that would have brought into being a coalition government for China. Naturally, the Communists were ready to negotiate. It was to their advantage. So they prolonged the negotiations as much as they could.

BEGINNING OF THE END

Meanwhile they had managed to regroup their armies, get hold of the Jap arms and supplies, and get all set. When the negotiations were no longer useful to the Reds, they broke them off. That was the beginning of the end for China. The United States charged bad faith—not on the part of the Communists, but on the part of the Nationals. We cut off further supplies to Chiang, and the rest is history.

So now we talk and negotiate with the Red beasts who have defied the whole free world, who have slaughtered American boys in Korea, who are but the puppets of Soviet Russia in the conspiracy to enslave the entire world under the Communist dictatorship.

When the Japs went into Manchuria in 1932, the United States proposed action to the League of Nations. The League talked and negotiated but took no action. That was the beginning of the end of the League. In 1936 Hitler defied it by marching into the Rhineland. Then Mussolini defied it by his aggression against Ethiopia. And we had to fight the Fascist dictatorships.

Certainly the people of the United States do not want war. They would be glad if it can be avoided by any honorable means. But negotiation is a two way street. As long as aggressor nations refuse to live up to their international obligations, to honor their treaties and agreements, just so long will the free world be menaced and our security endangered.

We believe the time has come to redeem our broken promises to the Nationalist Government of China and play our ace in the hole in Asia.

Appointment of Director and Assistants to Office of Defense Mobilization

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES C. AUCHINCLOSS
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. AUCHINCLOSS. Mr. Speaker, on this New Year's Day of 1951 our countrymen are looking to their Representatives in Washington to lead the way out of the gloom that is about us and bring courage and faith to a fearful and troubled world. There is real reason to take heart and not be bewildered by all the debate and turmoil in world affairs. All Americans agree at least on one thing: that we must be strong and united if we are to meet the challenge presented to us by these troubled times.

Much comfort and renewed faith in the future can be found in the appointment of Charles E. Wilson, president of the General Electric Co., as Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, and his selection of Sidney J. Weinberg and Gen. Lucius D. Clay as his assistants. These men are of large caliber, experienced in handling great and complicated problems. They are successful men who have proved their worth; they are men of undoubted loyalty and sincerity, unafraid, confident in the future of our country, and devoted to our system of free enterprise. They are dynamic men of action, prepared to do what is necessary to meet the demands of any situation that may be thrust upon us. They seek nothing but to be of service, and their great reward will be in the satisfaction of work well done. Such men are well equipped to be trusted with our destiny, and our citizens can take heart.

Mr. Wilson and his assistants deserve the full support of the Congress, not only because it is in the interests of our country but also because our countrymen demand it, and I, as one Member of Congress, pledge my support.

Joseph P. Kennedy Says: Get Out of Korea, Leave Europe to Europeans, Arm the Western Hemisphere

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT F. RICH
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Wall Street Journal of December 14, 1950:

JOSEPH P. KENNEDY SAYS: GET OUT OF KOREA, LEAVE EUROPE TO EUROPEANS, ARM THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE

What should our foreign policy be? In a speech on Tuesday before the University of Virginia Law School forum, Joseph P. Kennedy, former United States Ambassador to Great Britain, gave his views. Here is a condensed version of his speech.

"Lincoln in his famous Springfield speech said: 'If we could first know where we are, and whither we are tending, we could better judge what to do, and how to do it.'

"Where are we now? Beginning with intervention in the Italian elections and financial and political aid to Greece and Turkey, we have expanded our political and financial programs on an almost unbelievably wide scale. Billions have been spent in the Marshall plan, further billions in the occupation of Berlin, Western Germany, and Japan. Military aid has been poured into Greece, Turkey, Iran, the nations of the North Atlantic Pact, French Indochina, and now in Korea we are fighting the fourth greatest war in our history."

WHAT KIND OF FRIENDS?

"What have we in return for this effort? Friends? We have far fewer friends than we had in 1945. In Europe they are still asking for our dollars but what kind of friendship have we bought there? Is western Europe determined to preserve for itself those ideals of democracy that we have been preaching? Put to the test now as to whether she will arm herself effectively, even with our aid, to deal with the Russian threat, is she showing the kind of determination and the kind of will that amounts to anything?

"Plans for economic unification have fallen apart in the light of nation listic difference. French military power is only a shadow of its former self, and a strong minority of Communist sympathizers keeps

France in endless political turmoil. The military strength of Britain is one-fourth of what it was in 1946, and she shows every inclination to avoid the heavy burdens that would be involved in rebuilding it. West Germany, to date, has revealed no disposition to develop effective military strength. Italy is hopelessly ineffective, and Greece can hardly police her own small territory. Where is there in all Europe any buffer against a massed Russian onslaught? Worse than this, where is any determination to create such a buffer?

"In the Middle East we have oil, but no friends. Iran, Pakistan, even Egypt, seek neither our protection nor our influence. In Asia, China, whose friendship with us seemed deep-seated and enduring, is now massed against us with men, powerful armies, and new vengeful hatreds. Indonesia, Malay, Indochina are in revolt or heavy with discontent at the influences we represent. India is showing signs of succumbing to influences other than ours, more indigenous and more palatable to her desires. In Korea we are spending thousands of American lives to accomplish some unknown objective. Assume we stop the Reds somewhere across the belt of that peninsula, are we to continue fighting there indefinitely?"

RUSSIA'S STRENGTH

"On the other side of the iron curtain are massed manpower and military strength of a type that the world has never seen. Divisions which total in the many hundreds and which we know are well equipped and have the capacity to fight, can be thrown into battle anywhere on that great land mass that stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They are backed by planes of high quality and great quantity. Russia's navy includes a powerful fleet of submarines, and in all probability, she, too, has the atomic bomb.

"To engage these vast armies on the European or the Asian Continent is foolhardy, but that is the direction toward which our policy has been tending.

"That policy is suicidal. It has made us no foul weather friends. It has kept our armament scattered over the globe. It has picked one battlefield and threatens to pick others impossibly removed from our sources of supply. It has not contained communism. By our methods of opposition, it has solidified communism, where otherwise communism might have bred within itself internal dissensions. Our policy today is politically and morally a bankrupt policy.

"I can see no alternative other than having the courage to wash up this policy and start with the fundamentals I urged more than 5 years ago. It is absurd to believe that the United Nations can lead us out of this situation. The veto power alone makes it a hopeless instrumentality for world peace. The unwillingness of half the world to want world peace makes impossible effective organization to impose any such peace. In short, our chief source of reliance must be ourselves and we cannot sacrifice ourselves to save those who do not seem to wish to save themselves."

GET OUT OF KOREA

"A first step in the pursuit of this policy is to get out of Korea—indeed, to get out of every point in Asia which we do not plan realistically to hold in our own defense. Such a policy means that in the Pacific we will pick our own battlegrounds if we are forced to fight and not have them determined by political and ideological considerations that have no relationship to our own defense.

"The next step in pursuit of this policy is to apply the same principle to Europe. Today it is idle to talk of being able to hold the line of the Elbe or the line of the Rhine. Why should we waste valuable resources in making such an attempt? If the weakened European nations wish to hold that line and demonstrate a determination to do so, it may be that we can afford them some help. But to pour arms and men into a quixotic military adventure makes no sense whatever. What have we gained by staying in Berlin? Everyone knows we can be pushed out the moment the Russians choose to push us out. Isn't it better to get out now and use the resources, that would otherwise be sacrificed, at a point that counts?

"The billions that we have squandered on these enterprises could have been far more effectively used in this hemisphere and on the seas that surround it. Had we the defenses in Iceland today that one-hundredth of the money spent in Berlin could have built, we would have purchased safety with our money rather than added danger. We need defenses in this hemisphere, in Canada, in the Caribbean, and in Latin America. After all, these are our neighbors whose security is inevitably tied up with our own. We have no reason to believe that cooperation on their part will not be forthcoming and we can, and should, insist upon it."

MAKE COMMUNISM COSTLY

"People will say, however, that this policy will not contain communism. Will our present policy do so? Can we possibly contain Communist Russia, if she chooses to march, by a far-flung battle line in the middle of Europe? The truth is that our only real hope is to keep Russia, if she chooses to march, on the other side of the Atlantic and make communism much too costly for her to try to cross the seas.

"It may be that Europe for a decade or a generation will turn communistic. But in doing so it may break of itself as a unified force. Communism still has to prove itself to its peoples as a government that will achieve for them a better way of living. The more people that it will have to govern, the more necessary it becomes for those who govern to justify themselves to those being governed. The more peoples that are under its yoke, the greater are the possibilities of revolt. Moreover, it seems certain that communism spread over Europe will not rest content with being governed by a handful of men in the Kremlin. French or Italian Communists will soon develop splinter organizations that will destroy the singleness that today characterizes Russian communism. Tito in Yugoslavia is already demonstrating this fact. Mao in China is not likely to take his orders too long from Stalin, especially when the only non-Asiatics left upon Asiatic soil to fight are the Russians.

"This policy will, of course, be criticized as appeasement. No word is more mistakenly used. Is it appeasement to withdraw from unwise commitments, to arm yourself to the teeth, and to make clear just exactly how and for what you will fight? If it is wise in our interest not to make commitments that endanger our security, and this is appeasement, then I am for appeasement. I can recall only too well the precious time bought by Chamberlain at Munich. I applauded that purchase then; I would applaud it today. Today, however, while we have avoided a Munich, we are coming perilously close to another Dunkerque. Personally, I should choose to escape the latter."

WE PAY THE COST

"Finally, people will say this policy is turning our back on the United Nations. To this there are two answers. First, we cannot bear substantially the whole burden of the United Nations. In Korea, we have nine times as many troops in the field as all the United Nations put together. We have suffered 90 times the number of casualties that all the other United Nations have suffered, excluding only the South Koreans. And note the billions that we have advanced these nations as against the help they are giving us in Korea.

"Secondly, we must recognize that the United Nations is not at present a vehicle to enforce peace. If half of the world does not wish it to operate in this fashion, as is true of Russia and China, it is idle to pretend that it can operate in that fashion. The United Nations still has a purpose for voluntary organization and as a forum in which to air international issues. Looking at the United Nations in that role, the admission of Red China or any nation presents wholly different issues than are presented if we look upon the United Nations as a type of governing body, with governing powers. But half of this world will never submit to dictation by the other half. The two can only agree to live next to each other because for one to absorb the other becomes too costly."

A REALISTIC APPROACH

"An attitude of realism such as this is, I submit, in accord with our historic traditions. We have never wanted a part of other peoples' scrapes. Today we have them and just why, nobody quite seems to know. What business is it of ours to support French colonial policy in Indochina or to achieve Mr. Syngman Rhee's concepts of democracy in Korea? Shall we now send the Marines into the mountains of Tibet to keep the Dalai Lama on his throne? We can do well to mind our business and interfere only where somebody threatens our business and our homes.

"An Atlas, whose back is bowed and whose hands are busy holding up the world, has no arms to lift to deal with his own defense. Increase his burdens and you will crush him, or attack him from behind and he cannot turn. This is our present posture. It strangles our might. The suggestions I make would unleash our strength. They would, I am sure, give consideration pause to the strategists and planners of the Kremlin. They would—and I count this most—conserve American lives for American ends, not waste them in the freezing hills of Korea or on the battle-scarred plains of Western Germany."

A Tribute to Albert J. Engel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, with the closing of this session of Congress, our friend and colleague, ALBERT J. ENGEL, of Michigan, will leave us. He does so by his own choice. There is no doubt that he could have remained a Member of this House had he chosen to do so. His service has been so meritorious that he was entitled to the continued support of his constituency. I am satisfied that they would have been pleased to continue it if circumstances had not eliminated their opportunity to do so.

No Member of this House has served more zealously and ably than ALBERT ENGEL. He was continually a searcher after truth. He was never satisfied with merely a superficial inquiry into the facts of a given situation. He was satisfied only when he had pursued every source of information. There is no doubt in my mind that his aggressive and persistent efforts as a member of the Appropriations Committee has saved this country many millions of dollars. He was an enemy of waste and extravagance. He was likewise zealous and courageous for that which he believed was for the best interests of our Nation and its people.

It has been a pleasure and a privilege to have known and served in the Congress of the United States with a man of the character, ability, integrity, and courage possessed in such a large degree by ALBERT J. ENGEL. As he leaves the House, he may rest assured that he takes with him the high regard, esteem, and best wishes of his colleagues.

Overthrow of Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

SCHOOL OF FOREIGN SERVICE,
GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY,
INSTITUTE OF LANGUAGES AND LINGUISTICS,
Washington, D. C., December 28, 1950.

Hon. THOMAS J. LANE,
United States Representative from Massachusetts, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I wish to extend to you my profound gratitude for the inclusion of my article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This, I believe, is a great service and tribute to those who daily risk their lives fighting an unequal battle for freedom in Stalin's own back yard.

Many Americans have written me about the article. It is heart-warming to learn from their letters that so many people here lend their support to the movement to help overthrow communism by attacking it within its own sphere of influence.

More and more it becomes apparent that communism as an aggressive force cannot be destroyed by military intervention alone. It is equally true that communism, too, cannot conquer the world by sheer force of arms. Both Lenin and Stalin have clearly realized this fact. That is why by all means imaginable—ranging from inspiration to terror—communism stubbornly fights for the control of the mind and the spirit.

What the world faces now, fundamentally is more a revolution than a war in its accepted meaning. This is why revolutionary and not purely military methods are so largely used in this conflict, though, alas, not by the forces of freedom.

And because it is a revolution, it is not necessarily the better armed and economically the more powerful of the two adversaries that will emerge victorious from this battle, but the one who succeeds in swaying the psychology of the greater part of mankind and—regardless of race and nationality—command its will and emotions.

Fear is the principal weapon of communism. It is through fear that Stalin extends his control over the minds of the population on both sides of the iron curtain.

Today the United States is arming Europe. But the weapons alone cannot fight and the men who will have to use them seem to have little faith in their own ability to withstand an onslaught. They have succumbed to Stalin's pressure of fear.

The fighting spirit of the Europeans will rise only if they will come to understand that Stalin's formidable war machine may misfire at the critical moment, that his powerful Red Army may refuse to fight for communism.

But the Soviet machine may misfire, and the Red Army may balk, only if the Russian people realize that the west has no evil designs against them, that it wants to help them to regain their freedom, that it has the necessary moral power to oppose communism.

This appears to be a vicious circle, but it can be broken if we find a sufficiently powerful reagent to dissolve the amalgam of Soviet-inspired fear and lies.

A vigorous psychological attack behind the iron curtain will dispel this psychosis of fear on both sides of the barrier which now divides the world. The reaction of the Soviet Government to the effects of this powerful ideological offensive will display to the entire world the insecurity of the Kremlin regime and the falseness of Stalin's myth of popular support of communism in Russia. This will inspire confidence in the hearts of the Europeans and will strengthen their fighting morale.

Behind the iron curtain this attack will open the eyes of the people and give them courage to fight. Moreover, it will demonstrate to them the great moral power of the Western World and its determination. The very fact that the iron curtain will have been smashed (and smashed it can be) would produce a terrific psychological effect on them, which no Red victories in Korea or elsewhere may offset.

The picture in Asia today is dark, and it will be darker still, as long as a strongly organized Communist force dominates Russia.

The key to world's peace and freedom is in the Kremlin. It must be wrung from the hands of the criminal gang which terrorizes humanity. This can be done only by the Russians themselves, but only if the rest of the world and primarily the people of the United States help them to do so.

Enclosed I am sending for your consideration some mimeographed material which outlines a plan that I have developed in response to many letters from American citizens inquiring as to what they could do as individuals to help eliminate the menace of world enslavement by communism. The plan I suggest makes it possible for every American who is willing, to make a significant contribution to the weakening of communism. Furthermore, it does not require government support. I would be very happy to have your comments.

I would consider it a great favor to have your permission to call on you at your convenience to discuss this matter and give you some first-hand information concerning the work and the needs of the underground.

Wishing you a very happy and prosperous New Year, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

C. W. BOLDYREFF.

DECEMBER 8, 1950.

DEAR SIR: I have received your kind letter just as I was leaving for a lecture tour and was therefore unable to answer it immediately. I now wish to thank you sincerely for your friendly words and for the interest you have taken in my article.

There is much that you, and the many other readers who have written me, can do to rid the world of Communist imperialism by leading the Russian people to freedom. Here is a suggestion which I hope might interest you.

As long as communism rules in Russia, no family in the world is secure from the threat of war and tyranny. But communism cannot be defeated by sheer force of arms; it would only disappear underground and pose behind the myth of martyrdom.

Communism must be exposed by the Russian people—the only people in the world who have known for more than 30 years the evils of this Godless doctrine. And the overwhelming majority of these people are unalterably opposed to it. They are potentially the free world's most valuable ally in the struggle against the poison of Communist ideology.

To rally the Russian people to this struggle, three steps are necessary:

1. Organization of dissident elements in the U. S. S. R. as an active resistance against the regime.

2. Dissemination of a democratic ideology in the U. S. S. R. based on the overthrow of Stalinism and the establishment of free and representative state institutions.

3. Elimination of the Russian people's propaganda-inspired fear and distrust of foreigners.

Obviously, the work of the underground in Russia (steps 1 and 2) must be carried on by Russians. But the success of this work greatly depends on the accomplishment of step 3, the destruction of the myth of capitalistic encirclement." The American people must take the main initiative here.

Most Russians have had no contact with the outside world in the decades since the revolution. Many of them, who hate Soviet rule, have been duped into believing that the free world beyond the borders is so corrupt that it constitutes an even greater evil than communism. The German invasion of Russia during World War II has greatly contributed to the strengthening of this tragical misconception. Thus, the clever masters of the Kremlin strive to weaken the people's incentive to fight communism, and they, disorganized as they are, submit to its oppressions.

The American people, in a sincere, spontaneous, and unofficial effort to reach the Russian people with the truth about American ideals, can expose these Communist slanders, and regain the traditional friendship of the Russians.

I urge the citizens of every American community to prepare an open letter to the Russian people. By distributing thousands and thousands of such letters inside the U. S. S. R. and among the officers and men of the Red army, the underground can strike a telling blow at the foundations of the Soviet regime.

To make their open letter effective, the citizens of each community should include these points:

"We, the citizens of ————, greet the many Russians who, like us, are determined to resist the tyranny of communism. * * *

"We condemn communism as a godless evil. * * *

"We sympathize with you in your enslavement by your oppressors, and will help all your efforts to overthrow them. * * *

"We pledge, as free citizens, that if Josef Stalin should make war upon us all, we will never regard the Russian people as our enemies, provided they use every opportunity to resist communism. That we will help them to turn this war into a universal civil war for freedom.

"We pledge further, that once communism is overthrown, we will uphold the right of the Russian people to choose their own sovereign form of democratic, representative self-government."

Here is what you can do to initiate this appeal:

1. Organize a group of your friends to form the nucleus of a committee to enlist the support of local civic and church groups, by showing them copies of my article and explaining the program I have outlined here.

2. Working with these groups prepare an open letter, addressed to the Russian people in the name of your community.

3. Get your local newspaper to publish the letter, addressed to the Russian people in the name of your community.

4. Establish various points throughout your community where citizens can sign copies of the letter. Put collection boxes at these points for contributions to finance the printing and distribution of leaflets in Russian with the text of your letter with accompanying instructions from the underground to the Russian people on how to organize for an anti-Communist revolution.

5. When you have enough signatures to represent truly the citizens of your community, mail copies of this letter with signatures and the money you have collected to Verlag Possev, Limburg/Lahn, United States Zone, Germany.

Possev is an anti-Communist Russian newspaper, licensed by the United States occupation authorities, and printed in the United States Zone of Germany. The integrity of its directors is unquestionable. All the money which you send will be used to print leaflets with your community's message, and the accompanying instructions from the underground and to finance their distribution behind the iron curtain. Possev will acknowledge receipt of the money and report to you on the number of leaflets printed and the date of their delivery to the underground for dissemination in the Soviet Union.

If you will persuade the citizens of your community to join with other communities throughout the country in appealing to the hearts of the people, you will help to make it impossible for the Soviet regime to launch another world war and will help to free the people of Russia.

Remember that victory over communism depends only on our will and ingenuity. Our ability to reach the hearts and the brains of the Russian people is limited only by the volume of the technical means available. The cooperation and support of the American people will remove all obstacles.

I offer you my sincere thanks.

Yours for freedom,

C. W. BOLDYREFF.

On the Threshold of a New Year

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. A. S. J. CARNAHAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith an article from the Flywheel, a publication of the Rotary Club of Ironton, Mo. Mr. R. L. Barger is the editor. The article follows:

ON THE THRESHOLD OF A NEW YEAR

Another Christmas Day with all the joy it symbolizes to the Christian world has been duly recorded on the roll of passing time and we can now look back to that day of good will and joyous reunions with family and friends. But for the confusion and gloom that overshadows much of a distracted world, made so by the march of a philosophy so deadly to the cause of freedom, we here in America could have truly said we were nearer the realization of the ideal of peace on earth, good will toward men, than ever before. We enter upon the new year with unparalleled prosperity in our own land and a higher standard of living for all the people than has been the experience of any people at any time in the past. We can only hope that we can escape the austerity and sacrifices that is the lot of the peoples of other lands. We know not what a day or month may bring forth, but if we are called upon to defend ourselves and the free world from the aggressive force of world communism, we shall meet the issues in unity and determination that has characterized the attitude of our people for the 175 years of our Nation's history. Then let us enter upon the activities of 1951, not with an attitude of defeatism, but in a buoyant spirit and a supreme faith in our cause and despite heartaches and disappointments that may occur, face the months ahead with an unshakable faith to believe that the supreme power and benign purpose of a Mighty Being is stronger than the will of man and ultimately His purpose will prevail.

A Way To Stop Country X (Russia)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DEWEY SHORT
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following newspaper article by Marshall McNeil which appeared in the Washington Daily News of January 1, 1951:

A WAY TO STOP COUNTRY X (RUSSIA)
(By Marshall McNeil)

The strategy Atlantic Pact allies might use to stop aggression if it starts in Europe—a three-pronged offensive-defensive action—has been explained by the Air Force Chief of Staff, Gen. Hoyt Vandenberg.

It requires: A naval blockade; strategic bombing; a sufficiently strong holding action on the ground which will force the aggressor to use up his stockpiled arms and munitions.

General Vandenberg never mentioned Russia by name. He spoke only of country X. But his inference was plain.

His views were given to the House Appropriations Subcommittee that handles military supply bills and is headed by Representative GEORGE MAHON (Democrat, Texas).

Representative MAHON asked the general to comment on the belief of Air Force enthusiasts that overwhelming air superiority and overwhelming naval superiority could stop an advance, and on the belief of others that overwhelming air and naval superiority, plus sizable ground forces, could repel even larger ground forces.

KOREA NO TEST

The Air Force commander replied that Korea could not be taken as an example because it has an inviolate border (the Yalu River) and therefore air power could not be fully utilized.

"But," Representative MAHON interrupted, "even if you could use your strategic air power and go far to rear and bomb plants, that would not immediately have its impact on the front lines."

"No, sir," General Vandenberg answered. "Here is the difference. If we are now talking about Europe, where there are no borders that we cannot cross, and we are engaged in a general war, what the proportion of ground forces with overwhelming air and sea superiority would be that could hold a greater number of opposing troops would have to be answered by the Army, I think, because it depends on the terrain and so forth, but surely I agree with the principle.

"The principle is based upon this: The reason the Air Force does not believe that the war can be won solely by the Navy or solely by the Air Force or solely by the Army is this, and I am speaking now for the part that the air is going to play in this—

"Let us take, for example, X country which has overwhelming ground forces but that is relatively poor in its manufacturing capacity. Let us say that the Air Force succeeds in knocking out its potential to fight a war. The army of this X country is smart enough to know that our air potential exists, and as every army does, it stockpiles behind its lines enough for a certain period of time."

SLAVE LABOR

"We knock out the entire supporting industry of that army. It picks up its stockpile and it moves into a country that has a better and more modern facility for producing war material than the country that we have destroyed.

"Obviously, the Air Force then cannot have succeeded in its task of preventing this new country from being overrun. The overrun country becomes slave labor, and their factories and technicians become available to X country and to all purposes X country at least is as well and perhaps better off than before the Air Force destroyed the potential of X country.

"On the other hand, let us suppose that this movement into a defensive line is such that a smaller number of ground forces are going to oppose this great mass of X army. The reason we want a number of ground forces opposing this great mass of X army is to force them to expend their gasoline, their food, their ammunition before they overrun the attacked country. And since they are not able to have them replaced by X country, whose industry has been knocked out, retard the advance to the point that X army runs out of these essentials before it can superimpose itself on the industry of the captured country.

"That is the theory of the air-ground-naval team. You put the blockade in. The Army goes in and causes them to expend their stockpiles and the Air Force knocks out the industrial potential of X country to supply these armies.

"If the Army is strong enough, your defensive line is such that a smaller force, by retreating slowly and causing great casualties and forcing them to use up gasoline and trucks and tanks and ammunition, makes it so hard that they thereby cannot get them from the overrun country.

"Those overenthusiastic air people who say that the air can do it alone have missed that factor."

Let Us Provide an Adequate Merchant Marine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it is very discouraging to learn that the conferees on the appropriation bill have agreed to only $16,000,000 instead of $50,000,000 for the construction of new and up-to-date cargo carriers. This House should refuse to agree to any such cut in this all-important matter.

When will we learn our lesson? It seems that the experience gained in two World Wars has failed to teach us that a fast, up-to-date merchant marine is indispensable. Every military and naval authority has expressed the need of such.

In addition to this we should never overlook the necessity of having an adequate and ready-to-go shipbuilding industry. At the present time this industry is almost ready to give up because of lack of work. We owe it to this industry, so vital to our national defense, and the workers identified with it, to keep it going at a high state of efficiency. Therefore, I hope that the motion to concur in the conference report in this particular will be voted down, and that the sum of $50,000,000 be substituted.

Optimistic

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following editorial from the Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass., of December 28, 1950:

KOREAN SITUATION NOT HOPELESS

We like to think that the brilliant evacuation of the United States Tenth Corps from Hungnam doesn't auger too well for the eventual success of Chinese arms. For one thing, it showed that numerical superiority is relatively helpless in the face of superior fire power. Undoubtedly, the Chinese and North Korean troops encircling the evacuation area would have liked nothing better than to have decimated the UN forces to minimize their effectiveness when they were redeployed. They would also have liked to capture some of the United States equipment that they have learned to have so much respect for. It would be nice to be able to write home to Peiping that the aggressor Americans had been driven literally into the sea; it would have had tremendous propaganda value.

So, while we don't go too much for the tactical double-talk which labels a compulsory retreat a strategic withdrawal, it seems to us that the Tenth Corps gave the enemy a fine dose of frustration by pulling out when it did the way it did. The fact that the evacuation fleet was able to accommodate some 100,000 civilians, as well as the troops, proved how completely in control of the situation the UN troops were. The departure was practically leisurely, and it must have had the Communist opposition gnashing its teeth in rage.

As has been repeatedly demonstrated, hordes require a lot of lead to discourage, but it is possible to discourage them. The Kremlin talks in terms of bleeding the UN dry in the Far East. When you think it over, this process ultimately becomes a question of who is bleeding whom and, more importantly, who has the most blood. The Chinese have vast reserves of manpower, true, but we can reasonably ask how much staying power their manpower has. The evacuation from Hungnam gives proof of our better mobility. Chinese are made of perishable human flesh just like anybody else. How long can they go footslogging all over Korea in pursuit of an enemy which takes triumphantly to the sea when any given piece of terrain becomes untenable? And there's the age-old problem of supply lines, which must necessarily become thinner and less elastic as they are stretched deeper into South Korean territory. The same strategy which proved the undoing of the North Korean army—the slow, fighting withdrawal and then the end run via the sea—could work again.

Peiping is brandishing a big red fist and threatening the health of the United States forces if they don't leave Korea, but it really isn't advisable to be like a cannon on a popgun flush. The Chinese may yet wind up wearing the barrel they think they've got us across.

A Tribute to Earl C. Michener

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, time brings its changes. Pleasure is mixed with regrets as time moves on. It was a pleasant occasion when, 24 years ago as I became a new Member of the House, I became acquainted with EARL C. MICHENER, then, and for many years before a Member of the House from the State of Michigan. Today, it is an occasion of regret to realize that our long association in the work of the House comes to an end through the departure of my friend and colleague into private life.

It has been not only a pleasure but a distinct privilege to have enjoyed the friendship and helpful assistance of EARL MICHENER through all the years that have intervened since we first met. With each succeeding year my attachment to him as a friend and my appreciation of his character and ability have constantly increased. Humble in spirit, wise in counsel, studious and painstaking in the performance of all his duties, and intensely patriotic in his every endeavor he never deviated from what he believed to be right and for the best interest of his country and its people. He has served faithfully and well. His going from our midst is a distinct loss to the district that has honored him for so many years, and to the country as a whole.

On this day of his departure there is undoubtedly within him a strange mingling of sorrow and pleasure. Sorrow because he breaks ties of friendship that bind like cords, and pleasure in the knowledge that he is honored and respected by the entire membership of the House, and that his district would have continued to send him to the House as its Representative had he so wished.

As EARL MICHENER leaves us today, he may ever rest assured that his memory will linger long and pleasantly with each of us and will be an inspiration for the performance of our duties in the same spirit of devotion that has characterized his entire service.

The Strategy of Counterattack

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article appearing in the Washington Star under date of December 31, 1950, and entitled "The Strategy of Counterattack":

THE STRATEGY OF COUNTERATTACK

If, as seems to be the case, we are committed to the policy of letting our enemy strike the first blow, the address which John Foster Dulles had made in New York is—up to a point—an excellent statement of the only rational alternative which remains open to us.

What Mr. Dulles advocates is a policy of preparation for counterattack. This is a policy which accepts a grave risk. It grants the Kremlin all the time it may require for its own preparations, and it assumes, or hopes, that we will not be destroyed in an all-out surprise attack by the enemy. It is a policy which rests on a willingness to pay a fearful price in dead and wounded in our own American cities. It is a policy which leaves to the enemy the initiative and the power of decision. It is a policy which means that we must resign ourselves for the long future to an existence in an armed camp, an existence in which we shall not know from one day to the next when the blow may fall. And, to repeat, it is a policy which puts the very life of this Nation in jeopardy as the alternative to taking the initiative and resolving that we shall be the one to strike if the enemy will not accept a decent, dependable settlement.

Despite these appalling risks, however, the fact remains that this policy of preparation for counter attack is essentially the policy which has been adopted by the administration, and it is the policy which apparently has the support of a majority of the American people. Therefore, it is a policy which needs to be understood and which needs to be pursued with great vigor. On both of these counts, Mr. Dulles, in his address to the American Association for the United Nations, has made a valuable contribution.

Mr. Dulles appeared as a spokesman for that wing of the Republican party which does not believe that security for the United States can be found in a policy of retreat as long as there remains any hope of organizing throughout the free world a strong and determined resistance to the impending Communist assault. He said that his speech was not a reply to the recent proposals made by Herbert Hoover. Nevertheless, it was in some respects an effective answer, in both a moral and a military sense, to the notion that we can fall back and erect a kind of Gibraltar in the Western Hemisphere, which, with some outlying bases, would offer real hope of security. Mr. Dulles stated the matter well when he said it has been proved a thousand times that the defense which accepts encirclement by the enemy will fall apart, and that the mood which plans such a defense carries within itself the seeds of its own collapse.

Mr. Dulles agrees with Mr. Hoover, however, that we cannot and must not undertake to engage in little Koreas wherever the Communists may choose to stir up trouble. He says, and rightly so, that this leads only to weakness at all points and strength nowhere.

But what other choices are there? Mr. Dulles suggests two, neither of which is new. He hopes to build up enough strength around the rim of the "captive world" to discourage little aggressions and to make them costly if they occur. Second, he says that "if the Soviet Union itself decides on open aggressive war" we must have the capacity to counterattack.

It is at this point, in The Star's judgment, that the fallacies inherent in the policy of counterattack become most evident. It serves notice that we will not strike unless and until the Soviet Union decides on open aggressive war. What is that but an invitation for the Russians and their satellites to embark on Korean ventures wherever it may seem profitable for them to do so? The hope that we can build the restraining strength around the rim of the Communist land mass is at best a slim hope. That strength certainly does not exist now in many of the vulnerable countries, and if it does not materialize—in Iran for instance—are we going to sit back and let the enemy pick off these plums at will?

The main difficulty of those who think as Mr. Dulles thinks may well lie in the state of mind revealed by one observation in his address. So long as the die has not been irrevocably cast for war, he said, "we must assume that righteous peace may yet be possible."

Why should we assume any such thing? Certainly the available evidence points to a contrary assumption—to the assumption that, while we may hope and work for peace, the odds favor war. If we are going to assume, in the fact of the contrary evidence, that a righteous peace is possible, at what point are we going to conclude that the die has been cast irrevocably for war?

Obviously, in Mr. Dulles' view, that point was not reached when the Chinese Communists attacked the United Nations Army in Korea. Presumably, by the same standard of measurement, it would not be reached if the Chinese should strike, let us say, at India, or if satellite armies should march into Yugoslavia, or if an East German army should invade Western Germany.

In short, the theory that we must hold our fire until the Soviet Union decides on open aggression is almost as dangerous and as self-defeating as Mr. Hoover's policy of falling back on the Western Hemisphere.

If we are going to surrender the initiative to the enemy, then we must by every means and at all costs create the greatest power of counterattack of which we are capable. But if we will not use that power unless and until the Russians themselves resort to open aggression, we shall play directly into their hands. Through their satellites and the other means which they employ with so much skill, they can gobble up country after country, and one essential natural resource after another. If we let that happen we will find ourselves just as effectively isolated and encircled as would be the case if we followed Mr. Hoover's recommendations. The time to fight is not when the last hour has struck, but when the enemy's hostile intentions become clear. We must not let devotion to peace and dread of war so paralyze our reason and numb our will that we become incapable of action until the final and possibly decisive blow has fallen.

Do We Abandon Rome?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHET HOLIFIELD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Boston Herald of December 22, 1950:

DO WE ABANDON ROME?

What is this Europe that Kennedy and Hoover are willing to write off? It is 300,000,000 people. It is the mining and industrial facilities of the Ruhr, the wine of France, the cheeses of Holland, the olives of Italy. It is the Alps and the Riviera. It is the railroads and highways, farms and factories and schools. It is the Louvre and the canals of Venice.

All these are tangible things. They can in a rough way be weighed against the calculated risk of American forces thrown into their defense.

But what of the intangible things, the culture that is Europe's and that was our source? What, specifically, of the Catholic Church?

If communism takes over Italy, the Holy See will suffer a far worse fate than it did under fascism. Mussolini at least gave lip service to the church; communism is a new, intolerant atheism, with an old and unappeasable hatred for catholicism.

The church would, of course, survive. But what of her millions of communicants? The church has outlived many tyrants and will outlive many others. But the loss of Rome would be an unthinkable tragedy, not alone for Catholics, but for everyone throughout the world who stands in danger of communism. With all its great spiritual and temporal powers, the church has fought the world's great fight. Whether we are Catholics or not, it is here our mighty ally.

It is difficult to believe that the Kennedy-Hoover-Hearst school has given full appreciation to the implications of the surrender of Europe to Stalin's hordes. Europe is more than people or geography or works of man. It is the civilization from which we sprang; it is the faith in the dignity and freedom of man.

A Holiday Prayer

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. LYLE, JR.
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. LYLE. Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that the following prayer uttered by George Washington will inspire us to properly meet our challenge:

A HOLIDAY PRAYER

Almighty God, Who has given us this good land for our heritage, we humbly beseech Thee that we may always prove ourselves a people mindful of Thy favor and glad to do Thy will.

Bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning, and pure manners. Save us from violence, discord, and confusion; from pride and arrogance and from every evil way.

Defend our liberties and fashion into one united people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. Imbue with the spirit of wisdom those to whom in Thy name we entrust the authority of government; that here may be peace and justice at home and that through obedience to Thy law we may show forth Thy praise among the nations of the earth.

In the time of prosperity fill our hearts with thankfulness and in the day of trouble suffer not our trust in Thee to fail; all of which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

It's Time To Stop Fumbling

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY J. LATHAM
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 7, 1950

Mr. LATHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following article:

IT'S TIME TO STOP FUMBLING

Mrs. Sweeney's boy is dying out there! And thousands of mothers' sons. It's time to stop fumbling.

To die bravely in the service of one's country is a glorious thing, a noble destiny that millions of American youths would accept if duty calls. But to sacrifice brave young lives through the unfitness of swivel-chair fumblers is a crime against this Nation.

The United States is at war. It has been under lethal attack for more than a decade. But fumblers, and worse, in our Government prevented most Americans from knowing this fact.

It is sickening to cite the record. But this is a time for facing essential facts unless we are willing supinely to witness the destruction of our Nation.

Enemy agents, with the active aid of traitors stole our formula for making the atom bomb. They looted our State Department of secret documents by the bale. And they scuttled our defenses. These facts, substantiated by the record, were clearly stated by Senators and Congressmen in faithful performance of their duty. President Truman confined himself to a mere retort: "Red herring."

Our traitors and our enemies duped us into rebuffing and hamstringing allies upon whom we could best count to fight effectively against the Red master of the Kremlin. We mean China under leadership of Chiang Kai-shek and Spain led by Gen. Francisco Franco.

The Congress of the United States belatedly appropriated money to aid the Chiang Kai-shek forces and, more belatedly, moved to correct our misguided attitude toward Spain. But President Truman checkmated these moves, well-calculated for strengthening our arms. Up to now he has refused to release the funds Congress appropriated for Chiang Kai-shek's forces, all the while we are spoon-feeding Tito and throwing money into every rat hole in the world.

The President and his advisers say they don't like Chiang because he's corrupt and Truman likewise doesn't like Franco, presumably because he is a Fascist. Forgetting that, in the midst of another fight, we gave all-out cooperation to Stalin. And Mr. Truman openly confessed he likes old Joe, who is somewhat of a totalitarian and also somewhat corrupt.

President Truman is culpable in his failure to fire Acheson out of the State Department.

If your football team had a quarterback who fumbled frequently and especially where it helped your opponents, you would expect him to be benched or you would demand that the coach resign. If a top executive permitted his company's trade secrets to be filched by competitors, he'd be fired.

Acheson should go. Tell your Senators and Congressmen this, if you believe it to be true. Tell them you want no more handcuffs put upon our field commander, General MacArthur, as he was handcuffed during the Red build-up in China and after the victory at Inchon. Tell them you want no more of a State Department so futile and so fumbling as to permit the insufferable arrogance of our Red enemies appearing before the United Nations to charge us with aggression, and, with brazen assurance, to demand that they be seated in place of China's rightful delegates so that they may debate whether and how our Armed Forces shall fight.

We need an articulate press. With the honored exception of Mr. Hearst's newspapers and a few others, the press has largely failed in its function of correctly informing the people and supplying sound guidance.

This is no time for timidity, no time to be fearful of the smears of Reds or of the contemptuous retorts of their stupid dupes. We Americans want peace, we long and pray for peace, but we must not fear war.

If the United States compromises, vacillates and fumbles now, it will lose this war, and darkness and hopeless misery will settle upon mankind for centuries.

In the face of these stark facts, we must fear only to offend God or to see defeat of our beloved country. You should not fear the atom bomb, but rather pray that you and yours might have so merciful a fate as to die in an atomic burst rather than that you should live to go down with this Nation into the slavery of atheistic communism.

Fred W. Enwright

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, it often occurs to me that we often take for granted the unifying role which a newspaper plays in the life of a typical American community. If we stop to think of it, as we should, we realize that a newspaper records the life of a city from the birth to the death of the people who come and go through its history. It is a great responsibility to be an editor of a paper and a greater one to be its publisher.

For he can improve a city or neglect it. Under his leadership, the people can know all the facts, which is the basis of every well-informed and democratic decision that we call by the truly American name of "public opinion."

In tribute to all the publishers of our Nation, I insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following article by Tom McGovern which appeared in his regular column titled "Lynn Heartbeat," in the Lynn Telegram-News on Sunday, December 17, 1950. Tom's column which is a favorite with the readers of this democratic paper, honors the thirty-eighth anniversary as a publisher of that veteran newsman, Fred W. Enwright, of Lynn, Mass.:

ENWRIGHT MILESTONE

(By Tom McGovern)

Sometimes the news is close to home, so close in fact that you can almost reach out and touch it. Today is such a day for it represents another milestone in the life of a man who has closely affected the careers of all of us earning a living at the Telegram-News. The gentleman to whom I refer is Frederick W. Enwright who today is celebrating his thirty-eighth anniversary as a publisher.

Covering an entire side of the editorial room are the copies of every issue of the Lynn Telegram-News (nee Lynn Telegram before its union with the Lynn Evening News) since the first publication on December 17, 1912.

There are red volumes, brown ones, blue ones, and orange ones adorning the shelves of the library. Bound masterfully, they have withstood the assaults of friendly and unkind hands alike who have come to them at varying times for evidence of vindication, prosecution, impeachment, or indictment.

Take down any copy from the shelf and you have the careful documentary review of some era since 1912. There were the good days, the boon days, and the black days. But each day in itself was but another chapter in the life of a fabulous man who with all due respect to the people who are having biographies written about them couldn't begin to compare with this extraordinary character.

It is Sunday morning and the scene is Huntt's restaurant in Central Square. One man's height and general appearance seem to give him a special identity but you would never realize it from the tone of the conversation which is going on at the table.

The man who seems so interested in how many trips the trucks of Sanitary Boss George O'Shea made the previous day, how Eddie Foley's health is faring, what people are talking about politically, why porterhouse steak has risen 11 cents per pound is Frederick W. Enwright. He has just come from the 9 o'clock mass at St. John's Church, in Swampscott, only the previous evening he had supervised the preparation of a 32-page Sunday newspaper, 24 hours prior to that he had gotten $11,000 in cold cash on the line to fill the weekly pay envelopes of about 100 employees.

Most everybody who has ever had any contact with Fred Enwright will agree that he is an unusual man. He is plenty tough, and I personally have felt his sting on occasions, but on the other side he is innately kind, generous, and courteous. I have never gone into Mr. Enwright's office without him rising from the chair to extend a warm hand of welcome to me. That goes for any employee of the plant. If he can be of any assistane he is ever ready to help.

He was 26 when he founded the Lynn Telegram with some years of experience as a reporter on the Boston American behind him. He was immediately marked "taboo" by the people who felt they ran Lynn at the time. There was no need of a Democratic paper they said. By refusing to run advertisements in his publication, by withholding news which actually belonged to the public, they sought to cripple his enterprise. But they underrated the young man.

Even the people who weren't friendly to him started to buy his newspaper to see what effect the boycott was having upon him. They became so infuriated with what he was writing about them that they became individual circulation managers. Soon the "Telly" sales were zooming.

From Lynn, publisher Enwright went to Boston where his Boston Evening Telegram became the leading afternoon paper in the Hub. Spurred on by success, he went to New York and published a paper, the New York Bulletin, which also had a spectacular run.

The publisher's heart was not in these publications, however. When the Bulletin liquidated, he received a small check for $800,000 for his part of the proceeds. Shortly thereafter, the Boston Telegram became a memory and Fred was back to his first love.

People who take newspapers for granted should not. Ask the labor leaders of Lynn how they would like to be operating in a city with only one newspaper. It would place too much power in the hands of one man. That is why labor, the minority groups, the little people, should be grateful that Fred Enwright has kept Lynn a two-newspaper city all these years.

It has meant prosperity for many, many person who otherwise would not be enjoying it. It has given the average voter a chance to run for office, as attested to by the remarkable vote attracted by Councilor Pasquale Caggiana a year ago.

I suppose that sometime today Fred Enwright will reminisce a bit, whether it's at Huntt's restaurant with the boys, at dinner with the Mrs. and daughter Eleanore, or during an afternoon ride with Bill Berube, and he'll laugh at some of the things that have happened since that first edition of the Lynn Telegram reached the streets in 1912. Maybe his face will become stern as he reviews other happenings.

But no matter what comes or goes, the fact can't be questioned that Fred Enwright today in the full bloom of health, looking much younger than his 64 years, seems capable of directing the destinies of this great democratic institution for many years to come. And so I say humbly to my meal ticket, and I speak for all of the rest of us—"Happy Anniversary, Fred."

Launching of Steamship "President Adams" on Monday, October 9, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD J. HART
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, October 9, 1950, the Steamship President Adams, built by American President Lines, was launched at the yards of New York Shipbuilding Corp., Camden, N. J. Despite unfavorable weather, the launching was nevertheless a gala occasion. The sponsor of the ship was Mrs. Edward J. Hart, wife of the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The event was participated in by Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, by high-ranking officers of the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, the United States Coast Guard, and representatives of other Government agencies, especially of the Federal Maritime Board. "Launching of the President Adams," in the words of Mr. George L. Killion, president of American President Lines, "conceived in peace and dedicated to serving a peaceful world, has become a symbol of an alert America preparing to meet the challenge of the future."

Addresses on the occasion of the launching, which are included below as part of my extension of remarks, were delivered by Hon. Dan A. Kimball, Under Secretary of the Navy; Vice Adm. E. L. Cochrane, Administrator, Maritime Administration and Chairman of Federal Maritime Board; Mr. George L. Killion, president, American President Lines, and myself. These addresses follow herewith:

REMARKS BY UNDER SECRETARY OF THE NAVY DAN A. KIMBALL

A ship launching is always a happy occasion. Everyone experiences some variety of thrill. Those who attend merely as spectators cannot avoid the surge of spirit which takes place as the new vessel slides down the ways and becomes waterborne for the first time. To those who have cooperated in the building of the ship as company executives, engineers, architects, and skilled shipbuilding workers, the launching is the culmination of months of work. We, of the Navy, have a particular interest in the launching of the President Adams because it brings us one step closer to having at hand a fast vessel which we badly need. Launching days are great days, and my only regret is that there are not more of them.

Because of military requirements, the Adams and her two sister ships are temporarily going into the naval service. This means a delay in the addition of three important vessels to the American merchant fleet. There is a good reason for this. These vessels may be vital to us in the period that lies ahead.

The Korean campaign is the latest in a long list of events which have made it clear that the free nations under the leadership of the United States must speed up the strengthening of our common defense. The international Communist movement has shown that it does not hesitate to use force to overrun independent nations where it can hope to do so successfully.

Therefore, in the interests of our own defense and that of our friends we find it necessary to delay the pleasures of a maiden trip aboard a new luxury vessel. It is unfortunate that international events have combined to postpone this pleasure, but we can all take comfort in the fact that the Adams and her two sisters are to be available for possible emergency use.

Modern warfare planning has developed into an extremely complex science, requiring faultless coordination of many factors. This is because of the logistics requirements of modern armed forces.

Logistics is one of those obscure words which seldom find use except in military circles. Webster says it is the "branch of military science dealing with the moving, quartering, and provisioning of armed forces." We might sum it up by saying that logistics is the art of supplying the means to win a war. Like all other arts and skills, it it effective only when carried out with intelligence and common sense, backed by sound experience. Combat logistics are unglamorous, but most essential to a successful operation.

Statistics are dry, but you may be interested to know that during the time between the onset of Korean operations through September 30, the Navy, through the Military Sea Transportation Service, transported more than 2,600,000 tons of cargo and 185,000 passengers to the Far East, in support of United Nations actions. MSTS shipped to the far eastern theater enough fuel oil, aviation gasoline, motor gasoline, and Diesel oil to fill the Empire State Building three times, and still have a lot left over. I notice that the Under Secretary of the Army, Mr. Alexander, had a scratch pad out the other day and figured that the quantity of rations shipped to our United Nations fighting forces in the Far East would be sufficient to feed the population of the State of New Jersey for 6 weeks on a rather substantial diet.

Comparisons such as these, I think, are effective in bringing home to the average citizen, such as myself, the enormous demands of modern warfare. Thanks to the superior coordination of all branches of the Armed Forces, we have been able to concentrate great military, naval, and air strength in the Far East. The Navy has the responsibility of keeping these forces supplied, whether or not they are engaged in active combat. The Navy must also be ready to provide transportation to these forces, and their equipment, in the unhappy event it becomes necessary to transfer these now seasoned fighters to some other trouble area in the world.

None of us can afford to relax. We have found that the only language clearly understood by Communist aggressors is that of ready strength. I emphasize "ready" when I speak of this armed strength. We have proved to the world that the free nations are equal to the task of coming to the assistance of a weak nation which was about to be overrun by a more powerful neighbor. We hope that our action in Korea will serve as a sufficient demonstration of our willingness and readiness to fight for what we believe in. To date, we have no assurance that this demonstration of proof will be sufficient or lasting. All of us, therefore, must resist firmly any inclination to let down our guard. We should rather determine to pursue vigorously our plans to build up even stronger forces in being, so that while we seek actively for a peaceful solution to world problems through the medium of the United Nations, we can still fight effectively should open warfare be forced upon us.

I congratulate the engineers, the executives, and the skilled shipworkers of the New York Shipbuilding Corp., who have cooperated to build this fine vessel. I commend the enterprise of the American President Lines in causing this ship and her sisters to be built. On behalf of the Navy I should like to assure you that we will take good care of her. Some day, I hope in the not-too-distant future, the Adams, the Jackson, and the Hayes will sail the trade routes of the world with the familiar eagles of A. P. L. showing on their stacks. That will indeed be a happy day for all of us, because by this and other tokens we shall know that our efforts to secure a firm peace in a free world have been successful.

REMARKS OF VICE ADM. E. L. COCHRANE, ADMINISTRATOR, MARITIME ADMINISTRATION, DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, AND CHAIRMAN, FEDERAL MARITIME BOARD

Mrs. Hart, Mr. Hart, Secretary Kimball, President Killion, President Eossert, men and women of the New York Shipbuilding Corp., and distinguished guests, we are gathered here today to witness an event of particular, and to me personally, of very great significance. It is an event symbolic of the deep importance and the great wisdom of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 which sets forth so clearly the value to our country, both in time of peace and in time of emergency, of a strong merchant marine under our own beautiful stars and stripes.

This day is dedicated to the thrilling action of launching a fine ship—not to speeches. It is important, however, to note that gathered here to witness this launching are representatives of six great institutions; each of us vitally interested in the building of this ship. First, we have a representative of the Congress of the United States, whose charming wife is to be the sponsor. Second, those of the Navy, which under present plans will operate this ship to serve all three of the Armed Forces of this country. Third, the president of the American President Lines, and many of his staff, through the foresight and courage of whom the building of this ship became possible and to whom we hope that the President Adams can soon be reassigned to serve in her peacetime role. Fourth, many of you from this great shipyard, whose effort has been moderately disrupted by the need for a change in the immediate service in which the ship is to be operated. Fifth, the Federal Maritime Board and the Maritime Administration, whose sole aim is to further the development and maintenance of an American merchant marine within the laws provided to that end, and sixth, so large a representation of the American people for whose protection and benefit in the final analysis all American ships are provided and who, let me add, stand most of the financial burden.

The close relationship of the United States Navy and the merchant marine in exercising command of the sea is the foundation of American sea power. Manifestly, a great merchant marine is valueless unless the Navy can gain command of the sea, and equally would the efforts of the Navy in gaining such command be fruitless unless there were merchant ships to capitalize on that advantage in exporting our strength and importing our needs from overseas.

As one who has been honored with a life membership in local No. 1, and one who has had over many years great respect and warm regard for the management of this corporation, I should like the privilege of saying a word to the corporation personnel as a whole. We are approaching a period when more than ever labor and management must pull together, each contributing his share to the success of the joint effort.

I am too old a hand in shipyards not to be fully conscious of the complexity of the problems which you face together. Management's problems in providing the means of production, in obtaining and administering the contracts, and providing the necessary managerial and engineering decisions, are complex beyond the imagination of those unfamiliar with the effort. I am clear, too, that those of you at work in the yard are confronted with your problems and that there are many reasons which seem adequate to justify waiting for something else to happen—interruption of compressed air, failure in temporary lights, lack of materials, the need for assistance from some other trade, lack of plans or instructions. Some of these—in fact, perhaps all of them—at some time or another do prevent continued production.

I have only to urge upon you, however, the importance of a will to keep going and by all means the need to recognize the existence of the no-curtailment-of-production clause in the labor agreements. The no-lock-out clause is equally binding. I recognize that you have been meeting in consultation over mutual problems, which is thoroughly commendable, and in my view indispensable to satisfactory operation. I urge upon you, however, not only deliberation but the will to find solutions. That is the American way of getting big things done.

Shipbuilding is a vital industry in the United States. That does not, however, carry with it the right of employment but rather the privilege of working on jobs of national and international value.

Some no doubt believe that since the United Nations' forces have succeeded so gloriously in cleaning out Communists from South Korea that the present emergency is over and that we can all resume a leisurely outlook. That is by no means the case. We are still living in an ominously divided world. This ship is an important element in furthering the interests of our half of that world.

It has been my privilege to attend launchings in this yard for over 40 years. It is my sincere hope that I may be privileged to continue to witness them here for the rest of my active years.

REMARKS OF GEORGE L. KILLION, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN PRESIDENT LINES

Ladies and gentlemen, the occasion which brings us together here today is one of great significance. Launching of the President Adams, conceived in peace and dedicated to serving a peaceful world, has become a symbol of an alert America preparing to meet the challenge of the future.

The importance of this launching becomes apparent when it is realized that here today we shall witness the official transfer of three modern American flag ships intended for commercial use to the Department of Defense to swell the armed might of this Nation. I am sure we all deplore the necessity for diverting these fine new vessels from their intended peacetime mission, but we of American President Lines are proud indeed of the opportunity to serve in this time of national and world emergency.

We are proud and pleased that these ships are available, because in their availability for defense service lies proof of the soundness and wisdom of existing Federal maritime legislation as set forth in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

The hope of the free world lies in strong integrated public support of President Truman's entire defense program, which calls for a powerful Army, Navy, and Air Force in addition to an adequate merchant marine which serves as auxiliary to all three. As the President said in an address September 9, "The danger the free world faces—from open and brazen aggression—is so great that we cannot be satisfied with less than an all-out effort by everyone." With this I'm sure all of us are in complete, wholehearted agreement.

It behooves us to be strong, and to help keep all our free allies strong, because strength is the greatest assurance of peace in the world today.

We have faith in the future of America and a peaceful world. This faith inspires us to plan a ship replacement program involving the construction of seven additional new vessels. We are proceeding immediately with the study of new designs, and in conjunction with the Federal Maritime Board and the Navy, shall develop plans and specifications to assure adequate coverage of the company's world-wide routes. I am sure this is the spirit in which any other American flag steamship operator and shipbuilder would approach this important problem, just as they unselfishly cooperated with the Government in every previous national emergency. This is the spirit which gives our free enterprise system its virility and justification, and makes America and its system of government the savior of peace and the champion of all free nations.

The new Federal Maritime Board, under the able administration of its Chairman, Admiral E. L. Cochrane, and his worthy colleagues, board members Albert Gatov and Robert Williams, is dedicated to building a strong American merchant marine. Under their leadership, the true importance of a great fleet of American flag vessels designed to transport peaceful commerce and to meet the demands of war, will become fully known. I am sure the lessons learned from having an inadequate merchant marine will not be forgotten.

In this regard, I also wish to pay tribute to the leadership of Congressman EDWARD HART and many of his colleagues, who are a source of real inspiration to everyone working to keep America's merchant fleet dominant on the high seas of the world.

In this time of preparedness, I wish to reemphasize that we are thankful to be in position to cooperate with the Navy, and we know that the Navy will, in turn, cooperate with the American merchant marine in maintaining its rightful place as an important and vital segment of our national economy and national security.

The Military Sea Transportation Service, under the able direction of Admiral William Callaghan, has extended vigorous support to the privately owned fleets operating in the Pacific, and I am proud that these great private fleets were once again in position to supplement the military effort so sorely needed at the beginning of the Korean conflict.

Transfer of the Presidents Jackson, Adams, and Hayes to the Navy temporarily delays our plans for expanding our 25-year-old round-the-world service.

This growing global service, as well as our other services, continues to be served by fast modern passenger and cargo vessels operating with frequency and efficiency to over 30 ports of the world. We are in the shipping business to stay and we realize that to fulfill our responsibilities both to the trade and to national defense, we must at all times maintain a completely up-to-the-minute modernized fleet.

ADDRESS OF HON. EDWARD J. HART, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

I am grateful to Mr. Killion and his associates for this opportunity of participating in the ceremonies incident to the launching of the magnificent vessel, the steamship President Adams. And, of course, I am happy that the honor of acting as the sponsor on this gala occasion has come to my wife.

This launching marks another step forward in building a merchant marine worthy of the great Republic whose flag this ship will fly.

While at the time her construction was planned and, yet later, begun, it was expected that this great vessel would be engaged in only those pursuits relating to "the piping time of peace," it has now been decided that upon her completion she will be dedicated to the work of building and maintaining the armed might of America in a distraught and troubled world, whose dream of immediate and lasting concord among the nations has been shattered by the ruthless infidelities and brutalized aggressions of a conscienceless dictatorship. To this decision the American President Lines has graciously and willingly given its acquiescence.

But this deviation of use involved here does not lessen in any degree the delight which supporters of an adequate, efficient American merchant marine derive from what is taking place here today. Nor does it lessen in any degree whatever praise is due those who undertook the addition of this magnificent ship to the American merchant marine.

America has not lost her enthusiasm for peace. It is not as a result of any inglorious designs or ambitions on the part of our own Government that we find thrust upon us the stern necessity of rearming. No; rather do we embark upon this policy with the inescapable conviction that it will enable us more surely to avoid grim-visaged war and to foster and promote the cause of peace. As a nation we yearn, we strive earnestly, for peace, and as individuals our citizens beseech Almighty God that in His merciful Providence He will bring about the universal reign of peace.

What ultimately shall result we cannot tell. But one thing is certain. We in America cannot serve best the usages of either peace or war unless in that service we possess and employ a merchant marine fully adequate to discharge their respective requirements.

From time to time, suggestions emanate from even high governmental quarters, which, however tentative their nature, disturb and alarm the advocates and defenders of an adequate, balanced merchant marine. Not long ago there was projected the view, however informal the presentation, that America did not need a large merchant marine, because, forsooth, in time of national peril, it could depend for its safety and welfare upon the merchant ships of its allies. What arrant nonsense? What dangerous incogitance? Let us look only to Korea to learn that quantity of aid we can be sure of receiving from our allies, especially under present world conditions, when America's fortunes, yes, and their own, are at stake. America must become and remain as nearly self-sufficient as possible in all things, but in nothing more than in the adequacy and efficiency of her merchant marine.

Almost 60 years ago in a message to the Congress, President Harrison said, "No subject, I think, more clearly touches the pride, the power, and the prosperity of our country than (this) the development of our merchant marine upon the sea." The merchant marine has long since come to be recognized in responsible military and naval quarters, as an integral part of our national defense system. Speaking in very recent times before the American Merchant Marine Conference, Admiral Kinkaid had this to say: "Today the merchant marine is not just a ward of the Navy. It is a vitally important part of sea power, without which the armed forces cannot function. The relationship is no longer one-sided. We are just as much dependent upon the merchant marine as it is upon us."

Continuing, he said: "In this progressive age we cannot always look to history for guidance. But in certain basic and fundamental considerations we should do well to examine the past. History has taught us that every nation which has become a leader in world affairs has developed and guarded a strong merchant marine. There is nothing in the present-day situation which would indicate a change. In the past the necessity for a strong merchant marine has been largely economic. Today it is economic, but it is also logistic, two words which are very much alike in meaning."

Can language be plainer than that? We are a practical people. Yet, strange enough, we are often slow to learn the lessons our national experiences should have taught us. Our merchant marine was woefully deficient before the First World War. When that devastating conflict caught us up in its toils we were totally unprepared. Only a quarter of a century later, when catapulted into an even more devastating war, we were found almost equally unprepared. The time factor in each instance was on our side, and eventually, by the expenditure of billions of dollars which forethought would have saved to us, we built the greatest merchant fleet the world has ever seen. Let us not gamble that time will be on our side again, for all that enriches life, all that gives it zest and flavor, is at stake.

Of all the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries who participated in the framing of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, the Magna Carta of American shipping, I alone still serve thereon. I helped to fashion the declaration of policy which it contains, upon which the Congress placed the stamp of its approval. Let me recall it to your minds:

"It is necessary for the national defense and development of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine (a) sufficient to carry its domestic waterborne commerce and a substantial portion of the waterborne export and import foreign commerce of the United States, and to provide shipping service on all routes essential for maintaining the flow of such domestic and foreign waterborne commerce at all times; (b) capable of serving as a naval and military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency; (c) owned and operated under the United States flag by citizens of the United States insofar as may be practicable; and (d) composed of the best equipped, safest, and most suitable types of vessels, constructed in the United States and manned with a trained and efficient citizen personnel. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to foster the development and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine."

I believe in that declaration of policy today as firmly as I believed in it when I helped to write it. And as chairman of the great committee which proposed it to the Nation, I intend to adhere to it as strictly as the Congress, itself, will permit.

To effectuate that policy requires that we must have and maintain a permanent shipbuilding and ship-repair industry that shall provide steady employment to thousands of skilled workers in the yards and to other Americans in factories throughout our land which will furnish materials, equipment, and supplies.

It means we must have and maintain a stabilized industry, dealing with ships, employing additional thousands on land and on sea. And these ships must be speedy, efficient, and safe, and must provide regular, dependable service for cargoes and passengers to all parts of the world at reasonable, attractive rates.

It means that our flag, symbolizing a free American society of freemen determined to preserve free institutions, shall ripple in the breezes of the ports of the entire world, bringing courage and hope to the hearts of all men who love liberty.

It means in short, that we must have and maintain an American merchant marine ready to serve the Nation and its economy to the uttermost degree in time of peace, and if it must come, in time of war.

These are the main objectives. There should be no further delay in moving toward their accomplishment. Already many of our facilities for building ships have disappeared. Already organizations necessary to the achievement of these objectives have been broken up and scattered. Classic examples indeed of our failure to heed the lessons from experience. At the end of World War I, while our rivals went on building both combatant and merchant ships, we fell back into our spirit of indifference. When events forced us to commence rebuilding, we found ourselves short of drafters and designers. New techniques had been developed with which we had hurriedly to familiarize ourselves. New features had to be incorporated in the designs, and we found ourselves under the necessity of installing these new features without benefit of trial and error experience.

Shall we be so insensible to our national needs as to persist in following the same course again? We need in this country a wide and continuing course of education that will bring home to every American the indispensability of a satisfactory American merchant marine. Too many of our people are indifferent to what has happened, what is happening, and what may happen to that great institution. It was this indifference on the part of our people that resulted before World War I in the disgraceful deterioration of our merchant marine.

At one period of our history American bottoms carried 76 percent of the world's water-borne commerce. Just prior to World War II, that figure had dropped to less than 30 percent. Public indifference in America was one of the great factors in this deterioration. And when Pearl Harbor came, we were compelled, again in haste, to build only cargo ships to the neglect of passenger vessels, with the result that our fighting men were transported to the theaters of war on Victory and Liberty ships instead of troop transports, and too often on ships flying foreign flags instead of the flag of our own country which they were offering their lives to defend.

I know that the shipping industry in America has spent much money and has spent much time in endeavoring to dispel apathy toward the merchant marine on the part of the American public. But the effort must be continuing—it must be enlarged—and it must be more diversified, if it is to attain the success we hope for.

I cannot close without making passing reference to a report respecting the American merchant marine which is said to have been prepared and recently filed in official quarters. It was referred to by Senator JOHNSON, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in a speech inserted by him in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 19, 1950. This report, if correctly described, would seek to sacrifice the American merchant marine for the benefit of some of its foreign competitors. It would propose to close the so-called dollar gap, by penalizing and crippling almost to the point of destruction this great and necessary American industry. I do not desire to analyze the plan as I have heard it described, on this occasion. Time will not permit such analysis. But if it shall be my good fortune to be a Member of the Eighty-second Congress, I shall cooperate with Senator JOHNSON to the limit of my ability and energy, and shall use all available means at my command to prevent its proposals from being given any effect whatsoever.

I hope there will be many more days such as this in time to come. I hope that enough passenger vessels, equal to the steamship President Adams in capacity and suitability, to meet the obvious needs of our merchant marine, will soon slide down the ways of American shipyards and ride the bosoms of the oceans, harbingers of a happy, self-sufficient, prosperous America, dealing in friendly intercourse, with neighboring and far-flung nations, enjoying the blessings of liberty and peace.

Congressman Smith Calls for Complete Change of United States Foreign Policy and Asks the Administration To Tell America What Lies Ahead

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the Korean disaster to the United States calls for a sweeping investigation and a complete change in our whole foreign policy. It must be open to all so that we may learn the truth and nothing but the truth. The Kremlin knows every move that is being made in Washington, so why not throw the doors open to our own people so that they too may know what lies ahead for them.

President Truman illegally declared war on the North Koreans, and almost immediately, also illegally, turned the war over the United Nations. This was the first and only real assignment the United Nations had undertaken. The results today are too evident. During the period of time that the United Nations troops, composed of 90 percent or more of American boys, were advancing the United Nations Organization was vociferously and assiduously claiming the credit and proclaiming prowess by way of radio, newspapers, churches, schools, and every other means which promised publicity. But when the Chinese crossed the Manchurian border into Korea en masse and ruthlessly drove the troops back the war suddenly became the responsibility of the United States. European countries began thinking in terms of nationalism. They were ready to abandon the cause of Korea and let the United States get out as best it could. European nationalism then counseled that the United States ought not to involve itself so deeply in Korea as to become unable to provide those funds and military aid that those nations were expecting.

Commenting with some uneasiness and alarm on the situation in Korea the London Economist of December 9, 1950, says:

> In his speech in Washington on Wednesday the Prime Minister (Mr. Attlee) rose to the height of the great theme of Britain's partnership with the United States in its present peril "We stand by our duty and our friends," said Attlee on his recent mission to Washington, and a critical and hard-bitten, anxious audience of pressmen applauded him.
> There is no purpose to be served by trying to blind the fact that the alliance of free nations has suffered a grave defeat. * * * It goes without saying that the authority of the United Nations, so badly damaged by what happened in Korea, must be restored. * * * There is a task which can obviously be conducted only behind closed doors.
> The right strategy is not to abandon the continent altogether, but to exercise a strict economy of resources in continental adventures, to defend on the continent only the most vital areas and those where the air and the sea are at a maximum advantage.
> The first is to remember that what happens in any one area of the world is only part of a whole, and it is the whole that counts. If there have been retreats somewhere, let them be in places (like Korea) that are less vital; it would be folly to stand in the less important, at the cost of running away in the more vital, just because the less important case has come along first in time.

It is clear that England does not want our troops to be fighting in Korea, but says nothing about the humiliation and loss of prestige it would cause us were we to quit and withdraw, or about the American prisoners in Chinese hands and the fearful price the Chinese will exact from us to ransom those troops and to restore the war damages to Korean cities, and so forth.

Did Mr. Truman counsel with the British Government before declaring war on the North Koreans? Did he have the confidence of the United Nations before he declared this war? If the British Government had agreed to Mr. Truman's purpose to declare war, though this would not make the act legal, it would, however, now put England in a difficult position. The same is also true with respect to the United Nations. And it is difficult to see how Mr. Truman could have taken this step without the sanction of both England and the United Nations. It is assumed, of course, that what conversations, if any, Mr. Truman had with the English Government were through its representatives on the United Nations staff.

The United States is now in the gravest danger of its entire history. Both our domestic and foreign policies have for so long been in the control of men whose range of vision is so narrow and perverse that they have missed entirely seeing and doing what they were supposed to see and to do. It is a falsehood that the forces in Washington are fighting communism. When the politicians in 1933–34 forced the people to transfer ownership and control of all gold to them in exchange for paper dollars which would thenceforth be exchangeable for no other medium of payment except more paper dollars, this was and this is communism. Political ownership and control of gold by the politicians is the basis of all communism. Continual retrogression in all walks of life in the United States is now in process and will continue in process until we shall be in complete slavery, as is the case in Russia. The United States under gold had climbed to a great height and it will take some time to fall to the level of the totalitarian state, like Russia. Only the return of the gold to the ownership and control of the people can stop this and restore our freedom.

The Republican Party, if it was not destroyed in 1912 was nevertheless seriously and permanently crippled. Theodore Roosevelt with his progressivism ran for the Presidency on an independent ticket, splitting the Republican Party so as to let Woodrow Wilson in.

It was the Wilson administration that passed the Federal Reserve Bank Act which put the banking system in the hands of the politicians in Washington. Here was laid the foundation for later confiscation of all gold by the political authority and the enormous debt and inflation which prevails. The Wilson administration also violated the long-established principle, laid down by George Washington, not to become involved in the quarrels of other nations, when it took us into World War I. It was also under this same administration that heavy loans were made out of taxpayers' money to foreign countries after the war. The Federal Reserve Bank Act, World War I, and the European loans made by the political authority after the war formed the basis of the depression of 1929. Mr. Hoover had very little to do with it.

One of the greatest delusions believed by many of our people is that Franklin D. Roosevelt cured the depression which began in 1929. Let us look at the record. In 1933 there were 12,830,000 unemployed persons in the United States. This was the peak of unemployment. In 1938 there were still 10,300,000 unemployed, and in 1939 there were 9,840,000, which dropped to 8,120,000 in 1940, which was the year we began to make and to ship war goods to Europe. According to the many recoveries made from depressions in the past this is not a very good showing. If nothing at all had been done by politics to relieve the depression it is more than likely that the record would be much brighter. But the point is that it was the war that really put men to work, but this did not correct any of the real evils that were back of the depression. It merely covered them up, and sooner or later we will have to face them. The perpetual war we are now in is one of the evil effects of the "recovery" which we have made. And as this war and retrogression progress there will be less and less for the workers. Only the politicians will benefit.

Sacrificing American Men

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, December 28, 1950

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, assuming that it may not have been planned that way, nevertheless President Truman's command to our men to fight in Korea might be part of a plan to keep his party in power. It follows the party's methods preceding World War II.

And the New Deal propagandists, following the administration and the internationalist line, are hard at it, attempting to silence everyone who ventures to criticize either the motives or the methods used by the administration.

Unfortunately, as always, the so-called common people are paying the price while commentators like Mellett, Childs, Stokes, and others continue to howl on. All who question their claimed infallibility are branded, if not as disloyal, as being guilty of appeasement.

Mr. Truman and some of these commentators should hang their heads in shame, if there was shame in them, when they remember that all too often they have acted as champions of those who, high in official positions in the executive department, shaped the events which brought us to our present condition.

From Westbrook Pegler comes the following:

FAIR ENOUGH
(By Westbrook Pegler)

As Senator MALONE, of Nevada, puts it in tragic, dramatic terms, the Government of the United States has abandoned an American Army in a crazy venture in Korea. President Truman, on one of his erratic impulses, threw in a few companies of infantry and thereafter sent in the entire American Army on this side of the Atlantic except one division, apparently the First.

Too stubborn to admit his first mistake and pull the survivors off the southeastern beach last August, Truman permitted the Soviet enemy to lure into a major disaster the enlarged force, made up of young American citizens owing no obligation whatever to the United Nations or Korea.

They had been tumbled onto this oriental peninsula without the slightest consultation of the people who really are the United States. It is a fact that the United States has disowned these men.

We don't even refer to them as an army of the United States. More and more they are coming to be thought of by the people at home as an army of the United Nations, which is another futile parliament ostensibly working for peace but actually composed of two warring factions.

Senator MALONE remarked on the phone on December 23: "My Christmas dinner is going to make me sick." That night, in New York, in the Fifties and along Park, Madison and Fifth Avenues, and Lexington and Third as well, young men and women were reeling drunk, squawking and vomiting in a horrifying spectacle while the pictures were still trickling into our papers of American corpses rolled aside on a Korean road and of American soldiers with their little carbines at the ready, warily treading their way of sorrow with ghastly expressions on their tired faces.

About the same time, the President, in his characteristic shysteresque reaction, the trait which prompted him to call Congress into special session and insult the legislative arm before the world in a campaign speech in 1948, made a snarling reference to "confusers" as his answer to Herbert Hoover, Joe Kennedy, and the likes of Senator MALONE.

Not content with that, he got his stooge from Connecticut, BRIEN MCMAHON, to accuse Mr. Hoover of a monstrous act of appeasement when the truth undoubtedly is that the people of the United States are sick at heart of the terrible betrayals by Roosevelt and the rotten Communist cabal in the White House and want to wash their hands of Europe and Asia, both.

This MCMAHON is one of that awful cult in Washington and along the eastern seaboard who, solely for partisan reasons, have stood fast with Truman in his defense of traitors in the Government not only in Roosevelt's time but down to this very hour.

Their traitorous Democratic Party is so precious, the party of Frankfurter and LaGuardia, O'Dwyer, Ed Flynn, Alger Hiss, and Dean Acheson, that their response to any crisis can be calculated accurately in advance.

The facts that Roosevelt and his scheming team of traitors and fools, mercenaries, and poseurs, actually prepared this frightful situation and that Truman aggravated it by his early concessions to Stalin, are brushed aside and honest men with no motives but the purest patriotism are put in danger of prison for sedition for crying out against the doom.

Conjuring the probability that Russia has hundreds of divisions backed by a great quantity of fine planes and a powerful fleet of submarines, plus, in all probability, the atom bomb, Kennedy said it would be suicidal to fight the enemy on the ground in either Europe or Asia. So Kennedy is a confuser.

Like Kennedy, Mr. Hoover said the Europeans had a first responsibility to prepare their own defenses instead of leaning their entire inert weight on us.

That, in the strange mind of MCMAHON, was monstrous appeasement.

Who gave my country a mission to defend against communism two continents whose people have not got the guts to fight against it themselves? Who built up the menacing power of Soviet Russia, anyway? Who, but Roosevelt, with the approval of a thousand reptilian sneaks in and around the White House and planted in the departments, as Alger Hiss was planted, and Lee Pressman, too, by Frankfurter?

Would the Marines and the soldiers in Korea vote to pull out and come on home to organize a real national fighting force big enough and good enough to defend the Western Hemisphere on land and sea and in the air or would they prefer to stay there and take it just so that Truman and his rotten political party shouldn't lose face in the Orient?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the decision of our good friend and colleague, JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, to retire from the Congress carries with it a real loss for the country and for all of us who have served with him here.

He has had a long and distinguished career.

In the Spanish War, as a member of the New York Assembly for 6 years, as its speaker for 5 years, as a United States Senator for 12 years, and as a Member of the House of Representatives for 18 years, he has made a great contribution to his State and to the Nation.

His wide experience, his grasp of government, and the problems of government, and his strength of character have given him a powerful influence with his colleagues.

He commands the respect of all Members of the House on both sides of the aisle.

His retirement deprives the Congress of one of its outstanding Members.

Undermining Free Society

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith the following article by Marquis Childs, entitled "Undermining Free Society," which appeared in the Washington Post of Thursday, December 28, 1950:

UNDERMINING FREE SOCIETY
(By Marquis Childs)

Toward the end of the year now expiring certain incidents occurred which suggest a pattern of grim meaning for the future if they go unheeded. They are linked by the same threat of hate and fear deliberately exploited for political gain.

First, was the use of fraud and deception on a calculated and wholesale scale to defeat Senator MILLARD TYDINGS, of Maryland. TYDINGS had been chairman of the Senate committee investigating charges of communism in the State Department and he was to be eliminated because he drew up a majority report rejecting the charges. A picture was faked showing TYDINGS talking to Earl Browder, former head of the Communist Party, and this faked picture was circulated throughout the State.

Second, was the plot to smear and destroy Mrs. Anna Rosenberg by false charges of communism. Mrs. Rosenberg's name was before the Senate for confirmation as Assistant Secretary of Defense in charge of mobilizing manpower. This plot was anti-Semitic in origin and intention, following the crooked logic of the Fascist-minded who say that all Communists are Jews, and, therefore, all Jews are Communists.

Third, was the effort to drive Drew Pearson off the air and out of the press by the Communist smear. This last was the work of Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY, of Wisconsin. Significantly in the other two incidents MCCARTHY'S name also figured.

What McCarthyism means is, it seems to me, becoming increasingly clear. There should be no delusions about it on the part of anyone enjoying the privileges of a free society.

It happens to be true, that many of the values of that society have in the turmoil of the past 20 years been debased and even degraded. That is true particularly of the radio, where commercialism has put news and opinion in competition with the show business. One result has been sensationalism and distortion of the news.

But this is not the same as an open attack on the faith and the freedoms on which our society is based. And that, in my opinion, is what McCarthyism adds up to.

At the base of our society is mutual trust in the fundamental good will of most Americans. That trust was shamefully abused by a few Communist conspirators, some of them naive dupes, others consciously doing the will of Moscow. That source of danger has been removed.

From a different angle McCarthyism similarly attacks this trust. The attack is being directed from behind the sanctions of a free society. Thus the statements made by Members of Congress on the floor of the Senate or House are not subject to the laws of libel. A photograph carried in the free press is not detected as a fake even though it bears the label "composite."

Some people appear to have been attracted to McCarthyism because they do not like what is happening in the world and they think that McCarthy will help to restore "the good old days" of the past. This is exactly the mistake that some Germans made about Hitler. They hated the Weimar Republic and everything it stood for and they looked to Hitler to help restore Prussianism. They soon were caught up in the tragedy of their error.

Senator MCCARTHY has been compared to the late Huey Long, of Louisiana. This seems to me hardly a valid comparison. Long launched his meteoric career with a program for making over his own State. While it was utterly corrupt and cost many times what it should have cost, it did give the people of Louisiana new schools, new roads, and so on.

The significant difference is that Senator MCCARTHY has never made a single constructive proposal. Beginning with his intervention in behalf of the German prisoners in the Malmedy massacre, which had as one result the driving of former Senator Raymond Baldwin, of Connecticut, out of the Senate, down to the present, McCarthyism has been a destroying force.

How far this force will go it is impossible to say. Our form of society is peculiarly defenseless in the face of such an attack.

After the November elections Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, of Ohio, is reported to have discussed with some of his close associates ways and means of shutting down or restricting "the McCarthy one-man show." It is certainly a problem for the Republican Party.

But is is far larger than that in its scope. It is a problem for everyone who values freedom of choice in a free society. In the heat and passion of political partisanship it may not be apparent what is really at stake. And when it is finally realized, the values on which our society rests may be undermined. It may be too late.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret that as a result of voluntary retirement, our good friend and colleague, EARL MICHENER, of Michigan, will not be with us as a Member of the Eighty-second Congress.

He has had a long and useful career in the service of State and Nation.

In the Spanish War, as assistant prosecuting attorney and as prosecuting attorney of his county for 7 years, and as a Member of the House of Representatives for 30 years, he has devoted his life to that service.

EARL MICHENER has always been a leader in the Congress. His ability as a lawyer, his skill as a parliamentarian, and his over-all judgment has made this inevitable.

He has served as a member of the powerful Rules Committee. He has served as chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

We have been close friends over the years and I shall greatly miss our daily association.

I know that we all wish for him and his family health and every happiness in the years to come.

Concession in and Collaboration With Spain Could Strengthen Our Security System Tremendously

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LEROY JOHNSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, last summer it was my privilege to travel to Europe as a representative of the Armed Services Committee of the House for the purpose of studying the military defense assistance program—MDAP. I visited seven military assistance advisory groups—MAAG's—in as many countries. It was also my pleasure to visit Spain, which is not one of the signatories of the North Atlantic Pact. But I did so to learn what, if any, advantages there might be for us to obtain some military bases from Spain. I found that the Spaniards were receptive to the idea. The stumbling block was that we had no Ambassador in Spain and consequently we had no one of sufficient rank in Madrid to talk to Generalissimo Franco. An editorial in the Washington Star of December 28, 1950, explains why we have had no Ambassador to Spain.

I believe that the Soviet group in the UN literally rushed us into recalling our Ambassador to Spain in 1945. Our Ambassador was Norman Armour, a man of great ability. Later, when our State Department and UN representatives woke up—they undid this error and are now sending an Ambassador to Spain. This will give us a representative who can talk with Franco and perhaps make some arrangements that would be particularly advantageous to us in the future. My thoughts on the advantage to us of getting some bases in Spain, as set out in my report were as follows:

SPAIN SHOULD BE WITH US IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF A DEFENSE SYSTEM FOR WESTERN EUROPE

I visited Spain to gather first-hand information from our military attachés at Madrid and from others. Also, I took the opportunity of talking with most of the members of the Grand Military Staff of Spain. As nearly as I could determine, this organization corresponds closely to the American Joint Chiefs of Staff. It is the group of men who formulate and carry out the military policies of Spain.

Spain is a country with which we should find a way to cooperate, in our effort to build a strong mutual defense system in Europe.

Portugal is in the Atlantic Pact. It has had a dictator for 20 years. We seem to have no difficulty in working with him in developing the MDAP.

We should not let our political antagonisms blind us to such an extent as to prevent Spanish participation in our MDAP for western Europe. When your home is threatened by fire you do not junk the fire extinguisher simply because its manufacturer is not in accord with your politics or morals.

Spain's strategic location is magnificent. It commands the entrance to the Mediterranean. It has the only substantial defense line in western Europe. The Pyrenees, used as a defense line, permit great results to be achieved by a small army. With this range of mountins in our control, and with the cooperation of the country behind them, we could repel a gigantic attack.

As a military matter, Spain is the most strategic air base in the entire world. Operating from the Iberian Peninsula, the air fleets of any nation can sweep all of Europe except the extreme northerly part. It can cover the entire Mediterranean area, the Near East and northern Africa. Such planes would be in reach of the greatest industrial potential in the world, excepting North America, and some of the most valuable natural resources of all kinds in the entire world. No area in the world, in the light of present-day conditions, is as strategically located from the standpoint of defense as the Iberian Peninsula.

With Spain on our side we could control access to and exit from the Mediterranean. That is of crucial importance, and plainly evident. It would also mean that north Africa would be friendly territory. America learned the great importance of that in the recent war. It is sheer nonsense to turn a cold shoulder to a country of 22,000,000 people who could be so helpful to us, if the military storm should break over Europe.

Few actions of the Congress in recent times could ultimately be so meaningful to American defense and the future of the free world as the recent appropriation on behalf of Spain. The strategic implications are so sweeping, the defense potential so stupendous, that all the free world stood to benefit enormously from this effort to breach the unrealistic moat between western nations and Spain.

And yet, during my visit in Europe, the President announced his intention not to permit the expenditure of these funds on behalf of Spain.

This is a shocking abuse of Presidential authority, even leaving aside the grave effects this unwise move has on western defense efforts. As in the case of Presidential withholding of Air Force funds in the amount of $735,000,000 in the 1950 military budget, and as characterized unanimously by the Committee on Appropriations, this type of action amounts to an item veto, which is an unconstitutional act by the President, and so forth.

The editorial referred to is reproduced herewith, and I hope every Member of Congress has or will read it:

ENDING OUR SPANISH ERROR

President Truman's decision to nominate Stanton Griffis as Ambassador to Spain brings to an end one of the least admirable of the policies followed by the United States, in concert with the United Nations, since the end of the Second World War.

The story of that policy is worth reviewing. In December of 1945 Norman Armour, our last Ambassador to Madrid, was recalled. A year later, after the Security Council had rejected a Kremlin-directed attempt to act drastically against the Franco government as a threat to the peace—the charge was patently ridiculous—the General Assembly passed a resolution calling upon all its members to withdraw their heads of missions from Spain—a resolution which the United States fully supported. The move was designed to weaken Generalissimo Franco at home. But it did the opposite. More than that, since it violated the Charter's provision against interference in the internal affairs of any state, and since it could not be justified on grounds of either common sense or morality, it threw an ugly light on the judgment and integrity of the UN itself, as well as individual members.

By 1949, however, events had made clear that this action, besides having failed as regards undermining Franco, was not merely basically fraudulent but altogether absurd—absurd because it was aimed at weakening one of the strongest of anti-Communist countries at a time when the Western World, led by the United States, needed to do everything possible to fortify itself against the mounting menace of Red aggression. So at last year's General Assembly a majority—but not the necessary two-thirds—voted to rescind the 1946 resolution. But our own Government abstained. Largely because of petty domestic political considerations, it could not bring itself to take a forthright position on the issue. It could not do so until this year's Assembly session, when the UN finally got around to reversing itself. As a result, after a lapse of 5 years, we now are going to have an Ambassador in Madrid.

Mr. Griffis, who has rendered distinguished service on special wartime missions and who has more recently filled such posts as Ambassador to Egypt and Argentina, seems well fitted for the assignment. He has the equipment to undo—if anybody can undo it—the harm that has been done by our own and the UN's sorry 1946 decision to deal stupidly with Spain.

Building Air Might

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. MELVIN PRICE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith an article by Marquis Childs captioned "Building air might," which appeared in the December 30, 1950, issue of the Washington Post. The article follows:

BUILDING AIR MIGHT

(By Marquis Childs)

FINLETTER-M'CONE TEAMWORK

In this, the winter of our discontent, it is not difficult to find causes for complaint. The chorus of recrimination rises as though Washington were a wailing wall and the source of all the ills of mankind.

It is therefore news—under the man-bites-dog definition—to report a field in which progress is being made and men are working with a minimum of snafu. Directing the rapid expansion of the Air Force is a team that is pulling together effectively and efficiently to do one of the two or three most essential jobs in the rearmament program.

Secretary of the Air Force is Thomas K. Finletter, a New York lawyer who has served in several previous Government assignments in connection with the last war and its aftermath. As Chairman of the President's Air Policy Commission, he recommended a 70-group Air Force, and the maintenance of an expanded aircraft industry.

He has believed all along that preparedness to meet the threat of Soviet expansion should move at a much swifter pace. Consequently, when he accepted the post last April he was prepared to push as hard as possible for an expansion of air power.

Louis Johnson, then Secretary of Defense, was still plugging for economy in the Defense budget. But this did not inhibit Finletter, who came in with a more or less independent mandate from the President. The retiring Secretary of the Air Force, W. Stuart Symington, had tangled with Johnson repeatedly on the issue of economy versus expansion.

Last February 1 in a speech at Baylor University in Texas, Symington called for a reappraisal of America's Defense budget, pointing to the radically altered situation created by Russia's having exploded an atomic bomb and having built an air force capable of delivering such bombs against American targets. But this served chiefly to quicken the feud with Johnson. Symington felt so frustrated that there was nothing to do but get out.

Without the handicap of having engaged in previous controversy, Finletter came in as a new broom. Moreover, he has a show-me kind of skepticism which is like an X-ray. This was applied in salutary fashion both to military claims and pretensions and civilian red tape and reluctance.

One of Finletter's first aims was to speed up the construction of the continental radar warning system. He was told that the money simply wasn't in the budget for such a speed-up. His answer was that somehow the money would be found.

Finletter's partner is Under Secretary John A. McCone. McCone is a successful businessman and engineer who was also on the Air Policy Commission. He has drive and organizing ability to a high degree without any of the bluster sometimes associated with those capacities.

McCone is pushing through an aircraft procurement program that has begun to get rolling in a big way. Within 2 years the number of air groups will be approximately doubled for a total of 84. This is on the basis of reopening plants that were closed or partially closed at the end of World War II. By constructing new plants it is estimated that 168 groups could be created by the end of 1952.

Already 25 air bases have been reopened since June. Soon the personnel of the Air Force will be nearly double the 412,000 in the service at the time of the Korean attack.

The pride and joy of the team of Finletter and McCone is the big new B-47 jet bomber. Units equipped with the B-47 will be ready by the end of 1951 or perhaps even earlier. While its actual cruising speed and range are still secret, it is known that it will travel at 600 miles and over and carry the atomic bomb at that speed.

Finletter flew in the B-47 the other day. He sat at the controls and reported later that he was a bit startled when the pilot told him to make a 180-degree turn with the plane traveling at hair-raising speed. Beyond the B–47 is the B–52, which is an even longer jump into the supersonic world.

According to advices believed as trustworthy as most, the best long-range bomber the Russians have is an improved B–29. They are believed to be working on a B–36 type. But the important fact is that the improved B–29 can carry a Russian atomic bomb to targets in the United States. And the Air Force has never tried to conceal the fact that a certain number of those bombs would get through any defense now in sight.

But the retaliation to be meted out by a greatly expanded Air Force would be terrible. The threat of this retaliation will, it is hoped, keep the peace in the coming critical months while the land power of the North Atlantic nations is being built. If that is the outcome, thanks will be due in no small part to the production drive of the past 6 months. It is an example that could be followed in other fields where defense production has lagged.

Is It Immoral To Strike First if Attack Is Imminent?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article by Rev. Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., vice president, Georgetown University and regent, School of Foreign Service, appearing in the Washington Star under date of December 29, 1950:

IS IT IMMORAL TO STRIKE FIRST IF ATTACK IS IMMINENT?—A STRONG CASE IS MADE THAT THE UNITED STATES IS NOT MORALLY BOUND TO WAIT FOR A BLOW THAT MIGHT CRIPPLE IT BEYOND REPRISAL AND MEAN PRACTICAL ANNIHILATION

(By Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., vice president, Georgetown University; regent, School of Foreign Service)

The President's proclamation of December 16, declaring a state of national emergency, marked the end of what is probably the most amazing and confused chapter in the history of American foreign policy. The official description and recognition of the objectives of world communism by the Presidential decree put the issue, at long last, exactly where it belongs. The final confrontation has been reached between the two great centers of world power whose basic and irreconcilable character was frankly described by Soviet authorities many years ago. They never had a moment's doubt as to the inevitable clash that must ensue.

Lenin knew it and warned his followers:

"We live * * * not only in a state but a system of states, and the existence of the Soviet Republic side by side with the imperialist states (i.e., non-Communist states) for a long time is unthinkable. In the end either one or the other will conquer. And until that end comes, a series of the most terrible collisions between the Soviet Republic and the bourgeois states is inevitable."

After citing this fundamental Soviet doctrine, Stalin once added the laconic remark: "Clear, one would think."

VISHINSKY'S WORDS ARE HOLLOW

In 1927 he likewise declared to a visiting delegation of American workers:

"Thus in the course of further development of international revolution two centers will form on a world scale. * * * The struggle of these two centers for the possession of the world economy will decide the fate of capitalism and communism in the whole world."

The hard core, the stronghold, and arsenal of the non-Communist forces in this conflict with Soviet communism are the United States—a diagnosis which Stalin confirmed in his interview with former Governor Stassen in 1947. Neither he nor any Leninist believes in the continued coexistence of these two opposing worlds of economic thought and moral ideals. The protestations of peaceful intent spoken by Vishinsky in the United Nations are only the actors' lines of a prepared script designed to distract the audience from an approaching Pearl Harbor.

It is for that inevitable, titanic Armageddon that Soviet rearmament has been in preparation since 1945. There is, consequently, a recognizable logicality in Soviet maneuvers, whether on the diplomatic front or in their territorial aggrandizements, which makes Soviet conduct coldly consistent and not an enigma, or a puzzle, as some unhistoric minds imagine. The Politburo has ordred many a zigzag, to be sure, but their over-all strategy reveals the most coherent national policy and effective staff planning observable on the stage of international relations for the past 30 years. Look at a map of the world. Something like 800,000,000 human beings are now directly or indirectly under the control of Moscow—which means approximately one-third of the human race.

NO MORE BATTLE FRONTS

The place of A-bombs and H-bombs in this complex clash of power between east and west is, like the ghost of Banquo, the uninvited guest at every international conference. Ready to scrap the advantage conferred by those ghastly weapons if all other nations would agree to effective controls, the Government of the United States has been blocked by the constant veto of Soviet Russia. Thus, she gains time while the sands run out—till she has a stockpile of atomic bombs. Hence, regretfully but categorically, President Truman announced on April 6, 1949, that he would authorize use of atomic bombs again, should the dreaded necessity arise and if the welfare of the United States and the democracies of the world are at stake. "I hope and pray," he added, "that will never be necessary."

The frightful effects of that dreadful weapon are known by personal observation to the present writer, as he spent some 10 days in the ruins of Hiroshima in 1947 and interviewed many of the victims who survived the tragedy. The ethical problem of employing such a lethal weapon which, by the very nature and intensity of the explosion, will exterminate thousands upon thousands of civilians and innocent bystanders not directly employed in military activities, is not easy to resolve. Discussion of that moral aspect is made intricate and inconclusive, moreover, by the new and inescapable fact of total warfare.

The degeneration in international conduct since 1939 and the evil of total war have produced profound public consequences. There is no longer a battle front in the conventional sense; there is no longer a defined and limited zone of combat occupied by military forces, by men who are expected to run the risks of soldiers, leaving a rear territory inhabited by civilians not subject to the same hazards under the old concept of warfare. Today the total population is involved; the needs of technological developments embrace so much organization for armament and for supply that the battle front has moved into every city, town and village. There is no rear; there is no escape; and there is no shield of legal status. What is of immediate concern, then, is definition and clarification of the issue raised by President Truman's reference to necessity and the welfare of the United States, followed by his authorization to proceed with production of the hydrogen bomb.

Direct assault launched against us by an enemy who is known to have the atomic bomb—and no power would now attack the United States without it—raises one type of question not too difficult to answer. We should have no alternative but to retaliate in kind. A second question is more compelling and it is with this that we are here concerned: Would the United States be justified in launching an immediate atomic attack against an enemy power before it could use that devastating weapon against our cities? Under any hypothesis, the answer is extremely difficult to formulate, both for ethical and historical reasons. Our every tradition and instinct as a people, as well as conscience itself, recoils before such a dread alternative even in self-defense, although few moralists will insist that we must wait until the enemy delivers the first atomic blow. Under the new conditions of the atomic age such an aggression might very well be fatal, not only to a vast number of individuals, as is obvious, but to our entire system of national defense and to our existence as a nation. Clearly, atomic bombs would be used under title of defense only, a claim that would be set up by every nation. Hence, the concept and term "defense" must be clarified, both by definition and through application to concrete circumstances.

The use of force for legitimate self-defense is conferred by the natural law. This moral justification to repel an unjust aggressor by means reasonably adapted and proportionate to the nature of the attack, is the right not only of individuals but of the state as well. In the case of the state, it goes further still; it becomes an obligation, in view of the duty incumbent on government to safeguard the lives, the liberty, and the temporal welfare of citizens vewed individually and collectively. In total war the attack is no longer limited to acknowledged military tragets; it is leveled against whole peoples as peoples.

The problem, then, involves questions relating to the certainty and immediacy of an attack under given circumstances as well as to the special nature of some new defensive weapon. In the evolution of human relationships from primitive to modern and complex, the elements of certainty and immediacy have varied in step with the development of weapons of attack. Primitive man was justified in exercising his right to strike a preventive blow when he saw a bare fist descending upon him at arm's length, or a stone lifted against him. In the course of time he saw an ax uplifted, a dagger drawn, then a sword thrust at him, then a spear leveled, then an arrow fitted to a bowstring. The danger, though moving back in space, was still immediate and certain in time. With the invention of gunpowder, the assailant moved farther and farther away; but no basic change was introduced in the elements of certainty and immediacy of attack. Then, long-range artillery, though discharging explosives from emplacements even out of sight and miles away, could menace life and limb with equal certaintly and immediacy.

DISTANCE MEANS LITTLE

Now comes the age of air power, with military aviation carrying flaming death from bases located 3,000, 5,000 miles away. Aircraft carriers far out at sea, flying mombs, guided missiles, jet bombs, and atomic explosives can now be a certain and immediate menace from ever-growing distances in this era of global-minded warfare. Who shall maintain that the substantive and inherent right of self-defense is canceled out by an accidental circumstance or by the ingenuity of an aggressor in a chemical laboratory?

The Japanese Air Force which bombed Pearl Harbor was carried to a point designated for the take-off by a fleet of war vessels, including carriers, which, we now know, left the northern Japanese port of Tankan Wan on November 26, 1941, for the attack delivered on December 7. The attacking planes took off from the decks of their carriers at a point approximately 230 miles north of Pearl Harbor. It would be a tortured interpretation of the right of self-defense to deny the corresponding right to have intercepted and destroyed that advancing menace at any point, near or far.

Should history repeat itself and produce a Soviet feint in some remote area of Asia or the Middle East, it will be the signal for those burnt once in the fire of such deceit to keep their eyes fixed on the Northwest and Arctic sector of our American defense system.

AN APPALLING RESPONSIBILITY

If the Government of the United States has sound reason to believe (that is, has moral certitude) that a similar attack is being mounted and ready to be launched against this country from any source, then it would appear that President Truman would be morally justified to take defensive measures proportionate to the danger. That would mean use of the atomic bomb, as no power would launch a surprise attack on the United States without an adequate supply of atomic bombs. Should large numbers of civilians be harmed by American necessity to use the bomb in self-defense, that regrettable effect, not intended as such, would be attributable to what moralists describe as the indirect voluntary. An attack against us would have to be sudden, unannounced, sufficiently devastating, and so widespread in coverage as to cripple our powers of reprisal; the reply to any partial crippling would be so overwhelmingly atomic that no aggressive government could risk the gamble without certainty of success. Losing the gamble under present conditions of warfare would mean practical annihilation.

This argument presupposes, as its crucial premise, accuracy of information, honest information, competent information, and an alert intelligence service. If time permitted, a warning or an ultimatum to an enemy found to be preparing such an attack should be given. But, with or without ultimatum, I personally see no immorality, though much tragedy and horror of consequences, in the Government of the United States choosing the lesser of two evils. Neither reason nor theology, nor morals require men or nations to commit suicide by requiring that we must await the first blow from a power with no moral inhibitions and when, as in the case now under consideration, the attack would surely include bombardment by atomic missiles.

Even Christ himself did not disdain to seize a lash and drive the hypocrites out of the temple. But what an appalling responsibility is now laid on military intelligence, on diplomatic vigilance, and on all related security agencies which gather and analyze information in this atomic age.

General MacArthur Thanks Representative Rogers for Her Prayer for the Troops

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article from the Lowell (Mass.) Sun of December 26, 1950:

GENERAL MACARTHUR THANKS REPRESENTATIVE ROGERS FOR HER PRAYER FOR THE TROOPS

WASHINGTON, December 26.—"Whatever the odds against us, we will do our best," Gen. Douglas MacArthur today cabled Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, Republican, of Lowell.

The supreme commander's message was in response to a Christmas prayer offered in Congress by Representative ROGERS last Thursday. The Lowell Republican said at that time: "We can unite in sending the men in Korea our prayers, our love, and deep gratitude for what they are doing for us. We can pledge ourselves never for one instant to cease to care for them and to see that their sacrifices are not in vain."

General MacArthur replied today: "All ranks join me in thanks and deep appreciation for your message. Whatever the odds against us, we will do our best.

"MACARTHUR."

The World Situation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAY LeFEVRE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. LeFEVRE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following letter:

NEW PALTZ, N. Y., December 21, 1950.

Mr. ED ROSELL,
Care of Poughkeepsie New Yorker,
Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

DEAR ED: You have asked for this and I am sending it over. It is hard to refuse the request of a fellow who has always been fair and that's exactly the way I feel after 8 years in dealing with you on various national problems concerning our welfare. I hope however your readers will not think I'm trying to inject my views for any political reason and at a time when my voting power is fast coming to an end.

I firmly believe we are in this world picture today faced with the problem of survival. The fate of 150,000,000 Americans is at stake and also the future of humanity. I believe my record in Congress shows I have always weighed our problems with real concern, thinking first of our national welfare and secondly of the welfare of my own constituents. After visiting war-torn Europe with members of the Postwar Planning Committee, immediately following VJ-day in 1945, I honestly felt that it was the humane duty of America to help those poor unfortunate displaced people to be rehabilitated and to aid in rebuilding their facilities to the point where they could again become self sufficient.

After the Korean war started and these nations which have received so much American aid had the opportunity to really show their appreciation, through the United Nations, my attitude changed. I won't go as far as some commentators, by calling the United Nations a "tea drinking aggregate of diplomats," but we must admit they haven't accomplished much to date. Because of their regulations, one group has been able to veto any constructive program and we have had to carry practically the whole load. Don't think for 1 minute that the parents of the boys who have been fighting in Korea are not aware of this situation. Every true American is pretty much caught up with our furnishing the men, the equipment and the money to fight a war 7,000 miles away, while the diplomats at the UN bicker. There isn't a thing we want in the Far East, nor in Europe, not an inch of land and the whole world knows it. As soon as one voices even such a statement, he is labeled an isolationist. I'm not fearful of such a label—my record shows I have supported every move to stop the spread of communism, and that's been the main motive back of every foreign aid piece of legislation. The situation today has proved that our foreign policy, if there has been one, has been wrong. The present administration has proved that you can't buy respect and friendship with other countries any more than you and I can as individuals. Our money has been used to support a socialist government in Britain and they in turn have traded our goods with Russia. Similar stories are told relative to other countries who have accepted our ECA funds. England and France today want to appease Red China and imply the threat that if we don't go along, they will be unable to stand with us. How long can this continue? How long can the American people afford to be bled white? How long can we afford to deplete our natural resources? How long can we keep devaluating our dollar? And how long can we sacrifice our greatest asset, the youth of our Nation?

I say, the time has come to call a halt. We have been misled—Stalin is laughing up his sleeve at the confusion we are in, with practically not a man lost. Our "powers that be" even refuse to consider the aid of well trained Nationalist Chinese troops to help our boys in the Far East, better to use our American boys for the slaughter. We have lost face in the Far East already and I'm for saving all the boys we can in that area. Likewise I'm for keeping our troops out of Europe, at least till the European countries make a concerted effort to save themselves. Europeans are now telling us, our danger is in Europe. Our danger is here at home. I shudder to think of what could happen. Any individual with the slightest degree of subversive leanings toward undermining our American system, should be treated as a traitor. Our first duty today is to keep America strong. I'll go further and include the Western Hemisphere. When we entered World War I, we first ignored the basic concept of the Monroe Doctrine. Our troubles have increased ever since.

From the time I visited Russia in 1945 when they were supposed to be our friends, I have advocated that America must remain a citadel of strength, as force was the only language the Russians understood. Our President was told this upon our return. That statement was brushed aside with, "I've heard this before, boys, and from now on we will be firm." You know the story. The administration's policy has been one of appeasement. The President's refusal to take advice and his major appointments made purely for political expediency, has been a costly program. The American people have lost confidence, but Mr. Truman isn't going to resign, neither is he going to be impeached. He received the votes of the majority of the people. We, as a Nation, must at this Christmas time turn to prayer and trust that our Chief Executive will surround himself with the best men in this Nation for advice. Call it a tough attitude if you must, but let's make America a citadel of strength and notify the world that if we are ever forced into another world war we are going in it to win—with no mercy for the conquered and no funds for rehabilitation. I shall never sell America short. We have the strength and the where-with-all to maintain our leading world position. We have chosen freedom and with that spirit, if necessary, we must put the fear of God before the aggressor nations, so not one of them would dare start a war. Let's stop being "Uncle Sap."

This opportunity to express my latest views on the greatest of our national problems is very much appreciated. Although I'm looking forward with a great deal of enthusiasm and pleasure to again running my business in New Paltz, my native town, I shall always have you, my constituents, to thank for a broad and most interesting experience in Washington. It will not be an easy change. I shall miss the contacts with friends in the District and in Washington. I regret that I could not have left office in a world well on the way to everlasting peace. In the early spring, when I announced my decision, we were beginning to have hope. Then came the Korean war. Surprise, disappointment, gloom fell over all of us. I have confidence in my successor and the majority of the Representatives. Recent events will change the thinking of all true Americans. Our mistakes in the past must now be avoided. As Christians we are confident that right will win and as such, all of us must follow daily and extend to the far corners of the world, the phrase so often repeated at each Christmas time, "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

Very sincerely yours,

JAY LEFEVRE,
United States Congressman.

National Commander of Catholic War Veterans Calls for Common Sacrifice in Present Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include herewith an article by Donald J. McQuade, national commander of the Catholic War Veterans which appeared in the Catholic War Veterans' monthly paper. The article entitled "Emergency This" follows:

EMERGENCY THIS

(By Don J. McQuade)

It becomes apparent as the critical stages of the present global situation wend their ways, propelled by basic materialistic and atheistic programs of complacency and anti-God idealism, that we, Catholics, Jews, and Protestants, white and black, man and woman have come to the end of the proverbial rope. This endangers, not only our lives but the lives and well-being of our children; not only our religion, but all sound Christian ideals; not only our American way, but the only progressive hope of the suppressed peoples of the world.

We need not go far to find the use of materialistic and atheistic programs; need not analyze the mind of the self-styled atheist; need not question the attitude of our neighbors; but, definitely ask ourselves what we have done with the gifts of liberty, freedom, and justice. Have we used our freedom individually, to stanchly defend and promote true Americanism—as only a private citizen can?—or have we been materialistically complacent in our duties to God, to our country, and to one another.

Throughout history, the severest struggle of mankind has been to obtain liberty in keeping with his dignity as a human being, and so necessary for the fulfillment of his most sacred aspirations.

Yet during the world wars, our people have too often stated openly, "why are we fighting, what do we owe this cause?" Yes, and today, even in face of utter domination and complete destruction of our ideals, at any time, we have been warned, may come the claw of the hammer and sickle to disjoint the links of a free unity, and in its stead, proclaim a slave state, we are still complacent. Where? Not in Poland, it has happened there; not in Czechoslovakia, it has happened there; not in Yugoslavia, there too, it has happened; no, for none of these already conquered territories is there fear, but for the articulate and carefully laid plan of control and domination of these United States.

The iron curtain is not able to keep from our minds, our hearts, and our bodies the sting of terror and loss of ideals that Russia is continuing to expound. But, yet, in face of this peril that could befall us, our people, American people still find themselves liberal with their liberty, free with their freedom and irreligious with their religion; i. e., our Supreme Court upholds godlessness as a part of liberty, and anti-Americanism as a part of freedom, and our churches, during special prayers for peace, continue to be unattended.

The tenets necessary for the period which we are experiencing will go down in history as mere words, if there is not an immediate rejuvenation of the ideals upon which our great Nation was founded. We must vigorously move to restore the faith of our people in God as the Supreme Ruler and the Guarantor of inalienable rights.

However, the news of the hour will not allow us to be presumptuous. At once, we must make ourselves and our families ready for sacrifices that we have never known, to assure for our generation and the generations to come, the continuance of life with inalienable rights.

There is a crying need for the stoppage of the disconcerting decay that is occurring within. Americans must overnight refortify themselves with the knowledge of the principles of Christ, and of our country, and a sincere demonstration of them. Our children must be taught the principles of restraint and discipline; the mother and father, to respect their sacred contract; employers, to take an honest interest in the rights of employees; employees, to take cognizance of the rights of employers; and all of us, to consider and appreciate our basic liberties in the light in which they were bestowed upon us by our Creator.

In complete trust that Americans and other free peoples of the world still have within them the native ability to defend and protect their liberties, we believe that the threatening fangs of terror with which Russia is striking, will give to all of us, who can be called upon to be the world defenders of freedom, a new and invigorated will. Only through sacrifice, sweat and determination and with the help of God, will freedom be restored to suppressed, helpless people, and will freedom be protected in our loved land. Only then can we ourselves enjoy real progressiveness, progressiveness in the fear and love of God, progressiveness in the American way.

Many of us will be recalled to military status. Our leaving will cause certain sadness and sacrifice to our wives and mothers of our children. Our women may be mustered to bolster our defenses. Our industry will be called upon to produce untold quantities; our scientists and technicians will be found working far into the night. Our Government officials will be bound by a deeper sense of responsibilities, and keener consideration of decisions.

No room for profiteers, no basis for strikes, no realm for politics, no place for the weak, no time for the slacker—emergency this.

Air Power and Freedom

OF
HON. MELVIN PRICE
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the Members of this House an address made recently at the annual dinner of the Aero Club of Washington. The occasion was the anniversary of the flight of the Wright brothers at Kitty Hawk 47 years ago. The speaker was marshal of the Royal Air Force, Lord Tedder, currently in Washington as British representative on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The theme of the speech was the potentialities of air power.

I suggest—

that the best tribute we here can pay to the men we commemorate this evening is for each one of us during the coming year to do all that lies in our power to insure that the immense potentialities of aviation are fully developed and utilized. If we do, we may enable the free world to acquire unity and strength in time to prevent the crime and folly of another world war.

Mr. Speaker, United States participation in the Korean war revealed at home political animosities, interservice jealousies, and basic misconceptions both of national and military matters that should have disappeared long ago. Perhaps they did not because we are as a nation a young people, strong in our partisanship, intense in our enthusiasm, and determined in our convictions. Because we are the counsel of the British Air Marshal Lord Tedder, a man of mature military experience and a representative of a nation that has remained strong and free for almost a thousand years, may prove of value to us. The British long ago learned that survival must frequently be purchased at the price of change and sacrifice. It is a lesson we too must learn—as a people and in spite of our individual prejudices and loyalties—if we are to retain our freedom in face of the great danger with which we are presently faced.

Lord Tedder observed:

I am sure you do not think for a moment that it was easy for the United Kingdom with its world-wide commitments and its historical tradition to accept in peacetime a firm commitment to provide land forces for the defense of the continent of Europe; still less easy, I imagine, was it for your country to take the revolutionary step of committing your forces far from your own great continent. It has not been particularly easy for the people in the United Kingdom, just when they were beginning to see their way clear from the austerities they had accepted as the price of victory to face the prospect of a return to austerity as the price of peace. I am sure it has not been easy for the Royal Navy to accept the position that they no longer have the lion's share of the United Kingdom defense votes. These and similar sacrifices have been deliberately and willingly accepted in my own and other countries. Still more will be called for and none of them will be easy. Might it even be that your great industry might accept the, to you, drastic step of producing British types?

These are the words of a statesman and a philosopher. They are reminiscent of the words of another British statesman, one of the great leaders of our time. Speaking at the midcentury convocation of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology on his last visit to the United States, Winston Churchill said:

For good or ill air mastery is today the supreme expression of military power.

Lord Tedder understands this, and it is something that the American people must understand. On whether we do understand this or not our future will be decided.

In the address of Lord Tedder an interesting fact is given. There were more British Army casualties during 4 weeks of the battle of the Somme in 1916 than the total British and Dominion army casualties for the last 11 months of the war in Europe, D-day 1944 to VE-day 1945. Thus, even in military operations, air power can save lives.

On the commercial side, aviation produces speed and ease of movement and communication. It makes it possible for national leaders to meet in person, rather than through the unsatisfactory medium of diplomatic correspondence—and so find more easily a solution to the problems of the times. In this way, air power can help to prevent wars.

But above and beyond this, the air is a great levelers, a great equalizer, as Lord Tedder observed, "not in the sense of reducing everyone to the lowest common denominator, but in the sense of putting everyone onto equal terms with each other." Thus aviation takes us a step closer to the fundamental goal of our own Declaration of Independence—freedom and equality for all.

Mr. Speaker, it is freedom of the air and the freedo n air power can bring, that must be the goal of all our current efforts. The United Nations, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and other activities in which we are engaged have this goal as one of the main aims of their existence. But there is much we can do alone, apart from our cooperation with other nations. If by building a strong air power we can prevent war, insure freedom, and strengthen unity, then let us accept the challenge of Lord Tedder. Let us decide for freedom, democracy and survival. In tribute to those Ohio brothers who first conquered the air, let us do all that lies within our power to insure the development of American air power superior to any other in the world.

Under unanimous consent, I insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks of Marshal of the Royal Air Force Lord Tededr, at the annual Wright memorial dinner of the Aero Club of Washington on December 16, 1950.

The remarks are as follows:

One not infrequently hears it said that the invention of the aeroplane has proved to be an utter curse to mankind. That view is, of course, based on the use of the aeroplane as an instrument of war and not unnaturally, views are apt to vary with the circumstances. In 1940 and 1941 there were certainly many, many British soldiers, sailors, and civilians who regretted that aircraft had ever been invented; on the other hand in 1944–45 none of us were under any illusion that the reentry into Europe and the defeat of the great Reichswehr would have been possible had it not been for the work done before and during that campaign by the Allied air forces. Your marines, with whom there was I believe a small British marine commando, have just paid eloquent tribute to what the air did for them during their heroic struggle back to the coast. But it is difficult to assess exactly what air power means and perhaps some slight factual indication can be seen when one remembers that the British Army casualties during 4 weeks of the battle on the Somme in 1916 were more than the total British and Dominion army casualties from D-day in 1944 to the surrender in May 1945. People sometimes talk of the good old days before the aeroplane interfered—I don't think they were very good days and I do know that by shortening the last war, air power saved countless lives. I also know that unless we are prepared to meet the hordes of human cannon fodder which are the mainstay of the dictators' power with similar masses of human cannon fodder—a process which goes contrary to all the beliefs and instincts of western civilization—we must have overwhelming air power for our defense. And, since I do not believe that all dictators are fools, I believe that if we have that power, we may yet prevent a major war from breaking out long enough for the world to recover its sanity and avoid suicide. Are we sure we are building up the air power we need?

The other main attribute of aviation which I think immediately comes to mind is that of speed—speed of movement, speed of communication, etc. On that again there are differing views. Some people seem to regard speed as being a good thing in itself. Personally I do not. It can be most inconvenient and confusing and I have had all sorts of clock trouble traveling about this continent of yours.

No, in my view it is not the speed so much as the ease with which, thanks to aviation, it is now possible for responsible people who normally live and work thousands of miles apart to get together within a matter of hours and discuss mutual problems in a direct and personal manner, for which no amount of letters, cables, or intermediaries can provide an effective substitute. Personal contact is the only sure way of attaining mutual understanding, and mutual understanding is the only basis on which unity of interest can be translated into unity of action. The recent conversations which aviation alone made possible between your President and the British Prime Minister will, I am sure, prove to be an important step forward toward real unity of action. This is an outstanding example but one could quote scores of others to show what a vital unifying factor aviation is now and can be in the future.

During my service with the RAF and especially during the past 10 years I have again and again been impressed by the camaraderie, the fellowship, which seems to unite those whose ways lie in the air. In some subtle way the air is a great leveler—a great equalizer, not in the sense of reducing everyone to the lowest common denominator, but in the sense of putting everyone on to equal terms with each other. Rank, nationality, politics, all these and similar distinctions which are usually so apt to appear so important fall back into what I personally believe to be their more correct position of relative unimportance and irrelevance when two or three airmen are gathered together. I have specially noticed this in my relations with airmen of other countries, so much so that I instinctively shrink from using the word "foreign"—it seems out of place to speak of foreign airmen. Moreover, proof that this fellowship of the air is in fact a practical unifying force can be seen in the fact that in the discussions and arrangements aiming at insuring a common security for all of us it has been in the field of air defense that progress has been most easy and most real—simply because airmen think in a common language though nations may talk in different tongues. I believe that the fellowship of the air is doing great work in unifying the free world and can do still greater work—not by breaking down national barriers—if you try and break them down someone is sure to try and build them up again stronger than ever—but by infiltrating through them.

There is no doubt that in the free world there is a very great measure of unity of thought and belief as to the basic principles of freedom. But if we are to preserve our freedom that is not enough. We need unity in action and that must be backed by unified power.

That of course was, and still is, one of the main aims of the United Nations. Unfortunately that organization is still disunited and in the meantime and within UNO we developed the Western Union and are now developing the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, to provide for an effective unified defense for western civilization. The vital need for such a step was not, I think, fully realized in all quarters until the red light shone in Korea. But even now I often wonder whether people really appreciate what a revolutionary—and consequently what an immensely difficult—thing we are trying to do. Here we are—a collection of 12 nations—each of us intensely democratic, each of us intensely conscious of and proud of our national identity, our national traditions, facing up, in so-called peacetime, to the problem of building up a unified defense which will call for a closer cooperation between 12 nations even than that attained between the British Commonwealth and the United States after 2 or 3 years of war. We are no bunch of satellites doomed to toe a party line emanating from Washington, London, or Paris—or even from Moscow. No, we are a team of very sturdy individualists who, in order to preserve what we believe to be the very first principles of civilization, are prepared to pool our resources, to set aside some of our national and service traditions, to undertake commitments which previously we have steadfastly refused, and even to waive some of what we would normally jealously guard as our national sovereign rights. It will be done—but don't let anyone imagine that it has been or is going to be an easy job. One would have thought that experience of the last war would have made it clear beyond all doubt that the three services, sea, land, and air were utterly interdependent, that in fact they are not three separate services, but three parts of a fighting unity. And yet, though one would expect the strength of national traditions to make unification of defense difficult, I am inclined to think that interservice jealousies and the rigidity of individual service traditions are still, in various countries the greatest obstacles to be overcome.

I am sure you do not think for a moment that it was easy for the United Kingdom with its world-wide commitments and its historical tradition to accept in peacetime a firm commitment to provide land forces for the defense of the continent of Europe; still less easy, I imagine, was it for your country to take the revolutionary step of committing your forces far from your own great continent. It has not been particularly easy for the people in the United Kingdom, just when they were beginning to see their way clear from the austerities they had accepted as the price of victory to face the prospect of a return to austerity as the price of peace. I am sure it has not been easy for the Royal Navy to accept the position that they no longer have the lion's share of the United Kingdom defense votes. These and similar sacrifices have been deliberately and willingly accepted in my own and other countries. Still more will be called for and none of them will be easy. Might it even be that your great industry might accept the, to you drastic step of producing British types?

The root of the whole problem as I see it is that our freedom is at stake, our national freedom and our individual freedom; for that we are prepared to fight, and to fight to the death. But since another world war, whatever its military result, might well bring the end of our civilization our primary object is to prevent another world war.

Aggressors in the past have of course always had the initial advantage of being militarily prepared; they have also been able to rely on and in fact been enticed by, not only the unpreparedness of their chosen victim but also complete disunity amongst those who would otherwise be willing to help the victim. Remedy the unpreparedness and substitute unity for disunity and aggression won't appear half so tempting. In the meantime it must be made clear to the world that aggression does not pay. The unresolved problem of Korea is a clear warning to us that time is not on our side unless we use it to better purpose in unifying the defenses of western civilization. I suggest that the best tribute we here can pay to the men we commemorate this evening is for each one of us during the coming year to do all that lies in our power to ensure that the immense potentialities of aviation are fully developed and utilized. If we do, we may enable the free world to acquire unity and strength in time to prevent the crime and folly of another world war.

Address by Henry Ford II at National Farm Bureau Federation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT S. KERR

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, On December 13, 1950, Mr. Henry Ford II, president of the Ford Motor Co., delivered an important address to the annual convention of the National Farm Bureau Federation in Fair Park Auditorium, Dallas, Tex.

While there are some portions of it with which I do not entirely agree, it is in the main most constructive and helpful.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire text be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARSENAL OF HOPE

I am very happy to be here with you this morning.

Over the years, Ford Motor Co. has had warm associations with the Farm Bureau and with all American farmers and farm groups. A cornerstone in the policy of our company since the days of the model T has been "One foot in the factory and one foot on the soil." That policy is as sound today as it was 50 years ago, and all of us in Dearborn continue to live by it.

But since the days of the model T lots of things have happened to this world of ours to draw us even more closely together. And it seems to me an excellent time to take stock right now—at the end of a year which winds up the first half of the twentieth century.

We have lived through two gigantic World Wars—and a cold war which has broken out into another ominous conflict.

It may be trite to say that the meaning of these two wars and what has happened since is that we now live in one world. But that is the simple fact of the matter.

And the result is that today the United States of America has become the arsenal of hope of that one world.

What is going on not only affects the ways in which we may be able to go about our daily lives; it threatens to affect the human freedoms which Americans have always been ready to defend with their lives.

As I see it, three kinds of people all over the world are today looking to the United States as the great arsenal of hope.

First, there are the hundreds of millions of people in nations ruled by ruthless and power-hungry men. These people have lost their freedom. The only way they can recover this most priceless of all human possessions is through thought and speech and action. But they may not think or talk or act freely, under penalty of death. They must think as they are told to think, speak as they are told to speak, act as they are told to act. They are prisoners looking through the occasional slits in the iron curtain toward the hope that is the United States.

Second, there are hundreds of millions of people in nations who believe in human freedom and are still free to maintain their freedom. But they have been so weakened by events of the past two decades that they no longer have the strength to stand up to aggressors who would enslave them. They are weak and need time and help to recuperate. They, too, pin their hopes on us.

Third, there are the millions of people who are free and have been fortunate—people like ourselves. We, too, look to the United States of America as our arsenal of hope. We have confidence in ourselves. We have seen what we as a people can do to meet threats to our peace, our freedom, and our search for happiness. We know what our secret weapon is—the infinite resourcefulness, the infinite creative and productive ability of 150,000,000 free human beings acting together toward a common goal.

It is popular in some quarters to accuse the American people of having become so preoccupied with material things as to have lost a sense of moral and spiritual values.

Such critics miss the point completely.

Of course we are proud of our automobiles and oil burners; our electric refrigerators and dishwashers; our radios and bulldozers; our bridges and skyscrapers. Furthermore, we are never satisfied with them, but seek to make them better and invent new ones. Each, in a way, is a milestone on the road of our pursuit of happiness. Each, in some way, eliminates human drudgery and increases what we like to call our high standard of living.

But we do not forget for one moment that we have these things because we are free to create them.

Life without freedom is being chained to slavish misery—a vicious circle at its most vicious, with each day whittling away a little more of each man's personal hope for bettering himself.

The pursuit of happiness is slow enough and difficult enough under the best of circumstances. Without individual rights to basic human freedoms, no people can embark upon it. And our millions of telephones and deep-freezes and television sets are only a measure, though a very good one, of the ever-widening circle of our moral and spiritual progress.

It seems to me just as wrong when leaders sit back with a smile and tell us that everything is going to be all right. Sure, things are going to be all right, but only if we make them all right. And we need to know all that can be known about what is wrong and what we can do to make it right.

The only way I know of dealing with a problem is to understand it as best I can, take stock on how well equipped I am to deal with it, decide what to do, and then to act. After that—I suspect like most of you—I usually have to start the process all over again. That is, reexamine the situation as it may have changed, and figure out something else to do.

What is the situation?

I don't want to oversimplify matters, but what's going on at the moment, as I understand it, is that another bunch of well-organized and well-equipped gangsters is on the loose and hell-bent on making our One World a world of slavery. They threaten our lives, our properties, our liberties, as well as the lives and liberties of freedom-loving people everywhere. It is no idle threat, either, because organized communism with headquarters in Russia has made itself strong and powerful.

What have we got to do about it?

The answer can be as simply stated. On the one hand, we have to get, and stay, mighty in military strength to guard ourselves against this threat of force. Prudence suggests that we help our friends to get strong, too, so that we won't have to stand alone. On the other hand, we've got to continue progress in our peacetime pursuits. For in the long run we can really lick this situation only by keeping our own economy strong and healthy and progressive.

In other words, we've got to strengthen our right hand to do what we normally have two hands to do. And our left hand must be toughened into a powerful mailed fist that can meet force with force as may become necessary.

Stalin expects us to fall on our collective face on both jobs.

Now it seems obvious to me that if that is the gigantic twofold job ahead of us, we cannot afford the luxury of business and politics as usual; of being just farmers and stockholders and managers and union members, each of us jockeying for special advantage in a highly competitive world. We become once again—as we have in every national emergency—Americans together, a nation of resourceful free human beings bent on justifying once more our confidence in ourselves and the faith of hundreds of millions of others in us.

A striking example of this individual initiative and resourcefulness came to my attention recently.

Charles Lauritsen, professor of physics at the California Institute of Technology, helped our Armed Forces to develop the "shaped charge" idea used in our rocket projectiles. Sitting in his Pasadena home soon after the Korean war started, he learned that our projectiles were failing to pierce the Russian-made tanks operated by the North Koreans. He took off immediately for the Navy Missile Center, deep in the California desert, to find out why. Within a few hours he and other top scientists showed how the difficulty could be remedied. Within 3 weeks from that time the improved projectile knocked out its first tank in Korea.

As I see it, the job ahead boils down to this—in the language of Prof. Sumner Slichter, of Harvard:

"Our conflict with Russia is not merely a competition in arms; it is fundamentally a contest in production—and a long-run contest."

Now, a production race is something I understand. As the most productive farmers in all the history of the world, that is something you understand, too. Americans are production proud, and have a right to be.

"Only the productive can be strong," said Wendell Willkie, "and only the strong can be free."

If that is the guts of the solution—greatly increased production—production for peace as well as production for war to keep the peace—then the world is right in looking to us as the great arsenal of hope. For production is our dish.

And if increased production is the one way out of this serious situation, then maybe we ought to place the military side of it, and the diplomatic side, and all the other sides of our problem in the hands of the best people we can find who are trained in those things—and insist upon a free track and a green light and lots of elbow room to get on with the kind of job we know how to do—raising American production all along the line.

Now, of course, it isn't as simple as that. For one thing, we have to have leadership—the kind of bold, fearless leadership that tells us the truth about changing situations, gives us the score on how we're doing, and tells us what more we have to do. Americans don't like to be told the situation is serious after we lose a battle. We have a right to be told before the battle is fought.

We've got to have organization, too, to keep us from flying off in a thousand different directions. We will undoubtedly have to have rules and regulations and temporary controls—what we have come to call Government controls. That isn't bad in itself. It's as American as apple pie to have organization and controls—if it's done right.

To my way of thinking, government is the servant of all of us. We create governments to do for us as a group what none of us is strong enough to do individually. I get my dander up over Government controls only when the servant starts thinking of itself as the master—when people in Government get the idea that it is their job to plan our lives and order us to do things that we do better ourselves in our own way. And there are things we as Americans insist upon doing ourselves just because it's too dangerous to allow a Central Government to do them for us—though government might even, for a short time, do a better job.

And like all the rest of you, I reserve the right to squawk about the job the servant is doing. I certainly reserve the right to change my mind when the ballot box comes around again. As long as Americans can continue to do that, I'm not going to worry too much.

We at Ford Motor Co. are already having to cut back production because of Government limitations on the use of aluminum, copper, zinc, nickel, and other materials. Our position is simply this: we will willingly and without protest accept emergency regulations and cut-backs in our production schedules whenever it is in the national interest. We ask only that such emergency actions be taken systematically and with full disclosure of their necessity. It would be silly to ask us to lay off men, for example, without a compelling reason; we believe that cut-backs on civilian goods should, as far as possible, allow men to transfer directly to work on military goods.

For if there is one thing we cannot afford in a production race, it is to have men and machinery idle. The same thing applies to you as farmers—the United States cannot let good land and good men go unused, when the free world needs your produce.

There are other hurdles along the production raceway, too.

For example, economists remind us that each year the technological increase in productivity of our Nation amounts to about 2 percent. That is, new inventions, new and improved machines and plants, plus better human effort, enable us to produce 2 percent more each year. On top of that, the labor force normally increases each year by about 1 percent. Taking these two items together, it means that every year, on the average, we increase our ability to produce by about 3 percent.

This is the figure, then, that we must try to step up greatly to win the long and tough production race with Russian communism.

As you see, our ability to do this will depend largely on two things: the size of our labor force and stepping up technological advancement.

The first of these is going to be difficult. Today 61,200,000 people are employed—a near all-time record. Furthermore, millions of our best workers are going to have to be drawn off into military service. This will undoubtedly mean, as I see it, adding increasing numbers of women and older-age employees to the labor force. Even then, we cannot do the job by simply saying, "put more people to work." There aren't enough people to go around.

This points up the importance of doing everything we can to speed up our technology—expanded research and education, more and better plants, more efficient machines and tools, more efficient production methods—the kind of thing in which the American people have always led the world.

I should tell you that we in Detroit take with a large grain of salt the claim of the Russians that they invented mass production—and the automobile—and the airplane—and radio—and television. The only thing the Russians can take full credit for is their use of the veto.

Now to boost our technology and its application is going to take money. Lots of money—year in and year out. A single machine tool, as you know, can cost more than a quarter-million dollars.

Just to take an example, our company budgeted, in 1946, $500,000,000 to be laid out in the next 5 years for plant improvement and expansion and better machines and tools. In that period we have spent, not $500,000,000, but $600,000,000. And we plan to spend a billion dollars more during the next 3 years.

The way we look at it, this program is absolutely necessary just to keep us up-to-date in the constant peacetime competitive race to increase production efficiency.

The normal way and best way to keep such huge sums pouring into technological improvement is through savings and earnings. But this raises some questions.

More and larger taxes are going to have to be raised to pay for building up our fighting strength—a very important half of the whole job ahead of us. And large hunks of those taxes are naturally going to have to be levied against American corporations—American business and industry. None of us quarrels with that. No industrial citizen wants to do one whit less than his full duty during the emergency years ahead.

But, as I see it, the way those taxes are levied is going to make a great deal of difference. The wrong way will not lead to our goal.

As I see it, it should be a fundamental principle that taxes are raised in such a way as to make sure that industry and individuals will have the incentive and the ability to keep on investing directly in our common future—putting their savings and earnings into our constantly increasing capacity to produce. For if it is a tough, long-term production race with Communist war lords that we face, the health and development of our productive capacity is essential to the winning of the long-term peace, no matter what wars we might be dragged into over the shorter term.

Our goal, after all, is not only paying for a war. It is also to keep our economy in so healthy a position that we will emerge from the present crisis stronger than ever.

The dangers and difficulties in the job ahead are clear to all of us. One is serious inflation, which could undermine our whole economy and leave us helpless to do either one of the jobs we have to do.

This trend toward inflation we see everywhere about us. It is the old spiral. Increasing costs force prices up. Higher prices, in turn, necessitate higher wages and higher costs—and the process starts all over again.

Our costs at Ford Motor Co. depend very importantly on wages, and I'm not referring only to labor costs at Ford Motor Co. The cost of materials and supplies—our other major item of costs—reflects the labor costs of our suppliers.

We have always been proud that the name of Ford is associated with high wages. This makes sense to us. High wages mean good markets; low wages mean poor markets.

But wages don't exist in a vacuum.

We have recently negotiated a contract with the United Auto Workers which runs for 5 years—a long time; it's the longest contract we have ever had. The contract has been called by the union "the best contract in the industry."

This contract gives us a real promise of stability, a knowledge of our probable labor costs within certain limits, and other advantages; we think it means the sustained high output of thousands of workers.

Of course, contracts in themselves do not assure stability—but they do represent a firm intention on the part of both parties to keep their houses in order for a long time. And I believe that the possibility of labor peace is very good now.

For one thing, I think that labor leaders are beginning to realize that they have worked themselves out into a pretty lonely, isolated spot. They are in danger of getting themselves into the same bad position that business was in 20 years ago, when too many businessmen were thinking of their own welfare first and the welfare of the Nation second. Aggression tactics of the past two decades on the part of labor have been understandable—but recent events indicate that the American people do not intend to have the terms of their progress dictated by labor unions any more than by businessmen. Neither businessmen nor labor leaders can afford to set their own particular interests ahead of those of the whole community. Nor can farmers—or any other single group.

The other reason for my optimism about labor peace is simply that everyone in the Nation realizes only too well that we cannot win a production race if anyone drags his feet. We, as Americans of good will, simply must find peaceful ways to settle our disputes.

For strikes interfere with production, and nothing must interfere with production, for production is the way out of our difficulties.

But our difficulties and dangers are no greater than have been faced and overcome by other generations of Americans, as we will overcome these.

In closing, let me summarize briefly:

Today the United States has become the arsenal of hope of the "one world" in which we now all live. Hundreds of millions of people look to us; their only hope.

These are dangerous times. It would be folly to sit back and say "Everything is going to be all right." Everything is going to be all right, but only if we make it so. We cannot afford the luxury of business and politics as usual; of being just farmers and stockholders and managers and union members, each jockeying for special advantage in a highly competitive world. We've become once again, as we have in every other national emergency, Americans together, a nation of resourceful, free human beings, bent on justifying once more our confidence in ourselves and the faith of hundreds of millions of others in us.

The essence of our problem as the Arsenal of Hope for the world is production; greatly increased production for peace as well as the defense of a free world. "Only the productive can be strong, and only the strong can be free." We know what our secret weapon is: the infinite resourcefulness, the infinite creativeness and productive abilities of 150,000,000 free human beings, acting together toward a common goal.

If a tough, long-term production race is our problem, let's face it frankly and not try to kid ourselves. Let's organize ourselves to achieve that great goal. Let's ask government to call the signals, but call them loud and clear and keep us up-to-date on the score, so that we know what is expected of us. And let's get on with a job we know how to do better than anybody else in the world.

We are not expected to be supermen, just free men. We can do the job better—any job—because we are free men.

Our difficulties and dangers as a nation are no greater today than other generations of Americans have faced and overcome. We have a big chore ahead of us, but with the help of God, we can do it. We can make good as the world "Arsenal of Hope."

Address by Hon. Claude Pepper, of Florida, Before the Kojunsha Club, Tokyo

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a speech delivered by the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] at the Kojunsha Club, which is a distinguished Japanese club of professional men in Tokyo. I ask that it be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President and friends, it is a very great honor and privilege for me to be here today to talk before this distinguished group, which for more than 60 years has been one of the great sources and forces of leadership in Japan. Recalling that my old friend, Mr. Kasai, won the prize for oratory when he was at the University of Chicago, I think I would be wiser if I let him make my speech altogether for me and say nothing to you except to present him to you. But I am delighted to see again here in Tokyo my old friends, Mr. Kasai and Mr. Homma, both of whom I had the honor and pleasure to meet at the Interparliamentary Union at The Hague in 1938.

Japan has always been famous for her hospitality, in the smiles of your people, and in the warmth of the reception which you always extend to those who come to visit your beautiful country. My wife and I have for over 2 weeks been the happy recipients of Japanese hospitality, and it has been truly one of the most delightful periods of our life. Not only the people but the very sun itself has reminded us of Florida in the brilliance of the sunshine and the warmth of the beautiful Japanese sun. We pride ourselves in Florida upon our good citrus fruit, our oranges, and our tangerines. But I must confess I have never eaten tangerines quite so large, quite so beautiful, and quite so sweet as the ones I have just enjoyed today at this table and other places in Japan, and for this persimmon, this beautiful persimmon, I am jealous of it, because it is more obvious every day that my wife likes the Japanese persimmon better than she does her husband. We have a saying in our language that a little learning is a dangerous thing. So I cannot speak with great authority after having been in Japan for only a little more than 2½ weeks. It is our first visit to the Far East. We came through Dublin from the Interparliamentary Union Conference in early September, then came across Europe through Greece and Turkey and each one of the countries in the Middle East, Pakistan, India, Siam, Hong Kong, and China, and then came to the happy climax of our journey here in Tokyo. Naturally the first visit which we made in Japan was to your own incomparable Fuji. After that we visited your ancient and beautiful city of Kyoto, which for so long has been a shrine of Japanese learning and culture and beauty and enterprise. And only over the last week end we visited lovely Nikko and came to understand ourselves why we were advised never to say "Nikko" until we have seen Nikko. Now after having seen these wonderful places I understand my friend, Kasai, was not exaggerating as I then thought he might be when he made his speech of the 2,500 years of the glory of Japan when I first came to meet him at the Interparliamentary Conference in Hague in 1938.

You will understand, of course, that in what I shall say here today I do not in any sense of the word speak for the Government of the United States of America. The one and only spokesman for the United States of America in Japan is Gen. Douglas MacArthur. I want that very definitely and clearly understood. I can say, however, as a Senator and as a citizen of the United States that what I have seen here in the last 2½ weeks has been to me a very stimulating, a very encouraging, indeed a very inspiring picture. And I believe that never in all history have so many and such significant changes occurred as have occurred in Japan since the year 1945. And for the favorable nature of those changes, for the way in which you have adopted a democratic constitution, a democratic government, with executive, legislative, and judicial powers, each one separate from the other; the way you have extended a franchise to your people and given equal dignity with men to your women, and the way you have broadened the opportunities of education and strengthened free enterprise—for all these things I have only hearty and warm and sincere commendation for your great people. I have seen your democracy at work. At Kyoto my wife and I visited a polling place and we not only saw the election officials engaged in the performance of their duties, but we were gratified to see and to learn from the election officials that a few more women than men voted, which is an indication that the women of Japan are taking seriously their political obligations, and I predict that they will have a very large and honorable and responsible part in the strengthening of Japanese democracy in the years ahead. I also talked to educational leaders and have seen the vigor and virtue of your eduactional system, and I have also had an opportunity to visit your courts and to see that you have an independent judiciary as we have in the United States, where every citizen may be assured of a fair trial for his life, liberty, and property, an independent judiciary over which no government official has any control or authority. I have talked to your bankers and businessmen, and I have been gratified to see the degree to which you are recovering from the devastation and damage of the war, and I have heard from your businessmen and from your bankers your plans for expanding your trade to other areas and countries and for building here in Japan a great industrial community which will serve not only Japan and Asia, but all the peace-loving peoples of the world. But, of course, my principal gratification has been that in your constitution itself you have declared the new purpose of the new Japan to be a people of peace and not a nation of war. We ask ourselves, what is responsible for this splendid economic, political, and social progress that we observe in Japan. First, I should say that the progress is due to the attitude of the people of the United States who have not looked upon the people of Japan with revenge or, even though they might have been justified to do so, sought to inflict upon your people retribution. On the contrary, they have thought of the future rather than the past and hoped for a time of cooperation in the promotion of peace and prosperity between a democratic Japan and a democratic United States of America. And the second source to which I attribute that great change which has occurred in your country in 5 years is the leadership and the guidance and the direction of your country by Gen. Douglas MacArthur. It is well known that General MacArthur ranks as one of the greatest soldiers of all times. What I have seen of his great work with you in Japan leads me to the observation that history will say that he was also one of the greatest statesmen of all times. And the third source to which I would give credit for that progress is the splendid cooperation with General MacArthur which has been extended by the people of Japan. I give you my warm commendation for the cordial way in which you have cooperated with General MacArthur in this great program which has meant so much to you in the last 5 years.

So much for the past, the recent past. But naturally you are asking this question here in Tokyo and through Japan—what about the future? You know that General MacArthur and President Truman and the Government of the United States are working towards the early achievement of a peace treaty for Japan and that our country is doing all it can to hasten the day when there shall be a link between Japan and those countries with whom she was formerly at war, a peace treaty which will be just and fair and equitable for all. But the people of the United States also have some questions in their minds which are natural inquiries. First, they ask, how sincere are the people of Japan in what they have said in their Constitution about the principles of democracy? Will Japan continue to be a great democratic country after the peace treaty, or will the people allow their Constitution to be changed and to become again a document that would protect a few at the expense of many or give supreme power over all the people again to a selfish few. In short, will these great splendid democratic institutions which you have seen built in Japan in the last 5 years continue and become stronger after the peace treaty or will you retrogress back into an era which did not express the principles of democracy as do your Constitution and institutions today. So that question Japan will have to answer by its conduct. For myself in what I have seen in the last 2½ weeks I have confidence that your democracy will grow stronger, not weaker, that your people will not allow their sovereignty to be snatched away from them by anybody whoever they may be from without or within your country and that you will stand as one of the conspicuous democracies of the world before all the people of the earth in the years ahead. But the answer will not come from me, of course, but the subsequent conduct and example of the people of your great country. And the next question which arises in the minds of the people of the United States is, With what nation will the future Japan aline herself in the world? Will Japan in the future work with the democratic nations who want peace, who wish to cooperate with other peace loving peoples for progress and prosperity? Will she choose an ally and co-worker among those who will allow one another to be free and raise the standard of living of their people, or will a future Japan aline herself with those nations of the world who offer only war and poverty and misery and slavery for all those who allow themselves to be caught in their evil embrace. That is the problem that the people of Japan of the future will have to face and the decision that they will have to make. Again I say from what I have observed during my brief stay here I have confidence in the decision that the people of Japan will make. In the first place, under your democratic Constitution it will be a decision made by all the people and not by a very few who may happen for one reason or another to exercise power. And in the second place, the people of Japan are a wise and observing people and they see that those nations that work in the United Nations with the peace-loving peoples are making progress and helping one another and that they are all free and do not fear the other. They will see that those nations that have become satellites to a certain foreign power, which you readily recognize, today are slaves and servants and cannot free themselves from this killing grasp in which they have been caught. Again I say I have faith in the wisdom of the decision that the people of Japan will make. But it is you and not I that will stand before mankind and history to render your decision as to what nations will be your friends and co-workers in the future world. The people of Japan have had an opportunity to see what the United States of America would do even if they were the successful power in a war. Your people have been treated here with fairness and with friendship. Yet what Japanese citizen dares imagine what Japan would experience under the tyranny of a Russian occupation, or even those blandishments and hypocritical propaganda that Russia might offer as an inducement to friendship between that country and Japan in the years ahead?

We naturally expect that you shall have a part in your own defense. It would not be waging war or preparing for war if you were to be prepared to assist in preserving your own security in case you were attacked from the outside. We all recognize under a peace treaty and after a peace treaty you would undoubtedly work with and through the United Nations in the use of any forces that you have, and you would have the assurance that the peace-loving peoples would aid you in protecting your own security as they would expect you to aid them in defense against aggression in which they might be the victim.

In 1945 I sat in the capital of Czechoslovakia and talked to the President of the country, President Benes, with his former Minister, Mr. Jan Masaryk. Both of those great gentlemen told me that they felt it was only proper that being close to Russia as they were they should allow the Soviet Union to dictate their foreign policy, but they had the assurance from Marshal Stalin himself that Russia would never interfere with the internal affairs of Czechoslovakia. In less than 5 years both were dead at the hands of those to whom they had extended friendship and their country was made the tool and pawn of the power that said they only wanted to work with them in external affairs. Japan is far too wise to become a victim of such a betrayal.

What a tragedy we see here so near to Japan. The people of China have enjoyed the friendship of the people of the United States for over a century. When there were others who might have dismembered China it was the United States who said no. It was the United States who withdrew the exercise of certain special privileges that she might have continued to enjoy. It was the United States which since the war has poured billions of dollars into China trying to help the Chinese people, and yet today it appears that those in authority in China are using the Chinese people as tools of a foreign power to try to prevent the restoration of dignity and independence and freedom to the people of Korea. And so the people of China, if they allow themselves to be made the victims of the selfish interests of a foreign power cannot but suffer and make others suffer with her. On the contrary, what would be the future of China if that country were to declare its allegiance to the principles of the United Nations Charter and to the cause of peace and were to disengage themselves from the Soviet Union's grasp and to become the advocates of peace and prosperity and work to restore freedom and independence in Korea instead of interfering with those aspirations? What could China expect? First, they could expect to become a member of the United Nations, and second, they could expect assistance from the United States and United Nations in overcoming the damages of war and improving the living levels of the people, and in addition to that they would have the assurance that the United Nations would also help to protect them against any aggression from the outside. So the Russian way is the dark way of war and misery and poverty, whereas the democratic way is the way of prosperity and of progress and of peace and a better life for that splendid people. Surely the people so long famed for their wisdom will not make the wrong decision in declaring their choice and will before it is too late aline themselves with their friends and not those who are inevitably their enemies.

But I have kept you too long and I will add only this. Some of you may be asking yourselves this question. What will the United States do in the future? Are they in Asia for only a little while? Will they soon draw away and leave us? Are they seeking something of special advantage to themselves by coming to Asia? What are the motives of the United States? I can say to you, my friends, as a Senator and as a citizen of the United States that the people of the United States have come to realize and to understand that we do live in one world. It isn't a world of the west and a world of the east. It is a world of humanity and that a threat of peace in the East is a threat to the security of the United States, and the only way that we can confidently expect to stay out of war is to keep a lawful peace in all parts of the earth, and like officers of the law go with peace-loving people to the redress of any wrong and to the protection of any victim of aggression. Only in that way can we hope to have a lawful, a secure and a peaceful United States and a lawful and a secure and peaceful world. So the United States has not come for a little while to Asia. We are, through the United Nations and with peace-loving people, going to continue to do all in our power to make really a peaceful and prosperous and a progressive world. They know they lie who say that the United States and the peace-loving members of the United Nations who are fighting today in Asia come for anything other than a peaceful purpose. In the hospitals of Japan I have visited since I have been here, and the last time, only yesterday, there are boys from my State of Florida who came around the world to offer their lives and have given their limbs, maybe their future health, to try to protect the people of Korea. Around the earth from Florida, becoming victims of aggression suggested and initiated by a strong foreign power. What does Florida want from Korea? What does the United States ask? Nothing, except that they be free and independent, that they choose their own officers, they live their own lives, they choose their own way and we all work together for peace. We ask nothing from anybody except the privilege of friendship and cooperation and peace one with another. It has taken a long time to win democracy for the world, and dignity and freedom for the human being, that glorious task has not yet been achieved. Much more blood may have to be spilled before nations shall learn that they are not immune to the rules of law. But the people of the United States are determined that, however long it takes and whatever the cost in treasure and in blood, we will continue to fight in any part of the earth those who are determined to enslave their fellow nations and their fellow men, and we will continue to fight, God helping us, with others of similar sentiment until we do at long last achieve a peaceful and orderly and a lawful world and society of men.

In the Constitutional Convention, wherein the Constitution of the United States was written and prepared, there was behind the chair of the presiding officer, George Washington, the symbol of a sun. On one occasion in one of the dark moments of that Constitutional Convention when the outcome of the convention was in doubt, a very wise member, Benjamin Franklin, of Philadelphia, eighty-odd-years old, arose and said, "Mr. President, as I have sat here in this convention day after day and gazed upon that sun behind the desk of the presiding officer I wondered sometimes whether that sun was setting or whether it was rising." There have been those perhaps among you who in the recent years as you looked upon the symbol of Nippon who wondered maybe whether the sun of Japan was setting or was rising. I have seen here in your faces and in the faces in your people in your institutions, I believe I have heard from the heart murmurs of your citizens the assurance that the sun of Nippon is not a setting but a rising sun, a glorious rising sun of democracy disseminating over the whole area and people of the earth its glow and make its own invaluable contribution to prosperity, progress, and peace for all mankind.

Well, I am most grateful for your generous words and it has been a very great pleasure for me to be here today and I am most grateful for the distinguished interpretation, indeed the eloquent interpretation, which has been given by my friend Mr. Kasai today. I have told Mr. Kasai in case you wanted to do so I would be very glad to have you ask any questions. I realize that you are busy men, but I would be very happy to have you ask questions from the audience and I will answer to the best of my ability.

Sheridan Downey, Statesman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN C. JOHNSON OF COLORADO
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I have a friend, Alfonso Mirabel, of Los Angeles, Calif., who, like Senators who were privileged to serve with Senator Sheridan Downey, is devoted to this capable statesman from the far West. It is a matter of deep regret to me personally that illness compelled Sheridan Downey to give up voluntarily his labors for progress in the Senate of the United States. Mr. Mirabel has written a tribute to Sheridan Downey, which I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Well done," my friend, United States Senator Sheridan Downey, for the distinguished public service as a statesman rendered your State and Nation during the tenure of meritorious achievements as Senator from California.

Those who know of your character and that you have been an outstanding and brilliant legislator can now speak freely and comment on the good you have accomplished.

It is of record that recognition was given you as one of the Nation's foremost authorities on water and reclamation; a legislator with a sound grasp of the problems of labor and business. History has it that you have been a lawyer and man of foresight and vision.

One may now say that Senator Downey as senior Senator from California has fully served all the people of his State and Nation. Having established a record of sensible liberalism, always proceeding in a democratic way, always protecting the Constitution, never to the left or the right, doing the best he knew how for the general welfare.

Quotations from a March 27, 1950, letter are:

"DEAR MR. MIRABAL: I am enclosing th analyses in the United States Senate. I hav consistently fought labor's fight. I have no only voted for measures which directly benefit labor * * * such as higher minimum wages, full employment, workmen's compensation, repeal of certain sections of the Taft-Hartley law, etc., but I have worked and voted for such things as public-power development, low-cost housing, the European recovery program, liberalization of the Displaced Persons Act * * * etc.

"In short, my record in the Senate, as anyone who cares to investigate will see for himself, is truly liberal and a progressive record.

"Let me give you one example of the fight that doesn't show up clearly on the record because it has never come to a vote in the Senate.

"In 1945 I joined with Senator CHAVEZ, of New Mexico, and several other Senators to introduce a fair employment practices bill. A series of efforts on the part of Senator CHAVEZ and myself resulted in the bill coming to the Senate floor. Those opposed to FEPC began a filibuster, one of the longest in the history of the Senate. I worked to bring a petition and bringing the FEPC bill itself to a vote. As you know, it takes a two-thirds vote of the Senate to invoke cloture and thus end a filibuster by limiting time for further debate. We were unsuccessful in obtaining a two-thirds vote so were forced to drop our FEPC bill in order to insure passage of other necessary legislation that was being held up by the filibuster.

"However, I have joined with Senator CHAVEZ in every session since 1945, in introducing an FEPC bill. * * *

"I should like also to clarify my position on the public power issue. * * * I have always voted for public power. * * * I have supported TVA and the development of new public power installations, and I was one of the handful of Senators who voted to confirm Leland Olds' appointment to the Federal Power Commission.

"I want to thank you for your interest in my record which I offer proudly.

"Sincerely,

"SHERIDAN DOWNEY."

The letter lists but part of the history of the exceptionally brilliant and splendent magnificence of the record of the senior Senator from California.

Many remember his record for liberal pensions for our senior citizens that have reached certain age in their lives, his support and aid to F. D. Roosevelt's program including lend lease; peacetime draft; pay increases for Army inductees; domestic issues of national housing; full employment social security; aid to veterans of World War I and World War II, GI bill of rights (he was one of the Senators who conceived and sponsored this measure); Federal Employees Act; international control of atomic energy through the United Nations; State rights of tideland oil; establishment of a west coast Naval Academy; aid to Greece and Turkey and other nations threatened by the Communist peril. He consistently fought efforts by other States to divert water belonging to California. To keep gamblers and racketeers and blackmailers out of California was always one of his known battles. He always combated known crimes in the Nation. "Adieu," to one who meritoriously and with excellence served his people in the United States Senate, and will continue to serve his fellow men and the world in his own way in the future.

Fat UN Employee Pay for Doling Out Relief Arouses Arabs' Wrath

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HUGH BUTLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Miss Dorothy Thompson appearing in the Washington Star for December 30, 1950, entitled "Fat UN Employee Pay for Doling Out Relief Arouses Arabs' Wrath."

This article demonstrates once again how impossible it is for us to purchase good will with lavish expenditures of Government money. The article shows that we are incurring ill will rather than good will in the Arab countries.

The article also demonstrates once again how extremely difficult it is to make any headway toward cutting down the excessive costs of the Federal Government when the executive branch is not really interested in cooperating with congressional efforts to cut down those costs. The excessive salaries discussed in this article are mostly paid for ultimately by the American taxpayer. However, they are actually disbursed by a UN agency and that makes it very difficult for Congress to reach and control.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FAT UN EMPLOYEE PAY FOR DOLING OUT RELIEF AROUSES ARABS' WRATH—GROUP SEEN DOING NOTHING TO IMPROVE RELATIONS OF MIDDLE EAST WITH WEST

(By Dorothy Thompson)

EN ROUTE HOME FROM THE MIDDLE EAST.—The United Nations is doing nothing to improve relations between the Middle East and the west. The UN appears as representative only of the Americas, the British Commonwealth and Western Europe. Russia and associates are not in the picture.

The chief UN activity is dispensing relief to nearly 900,000 officially registered Palestinian refugees, living in tent cities. This consists, per person per fortnight, of 11 pounds of flour, about 3 cups of dried beans or peas, 3 cups of rice, 3 cups of wheat and 1 cup of sugar. Pregnant women and children get an extra ration of a cup of skimmed milk per day. When there are fats this ration is reduced. Occasionally a family will get a tin of canned fish. Meat or eggs they never get. The diet is all starch.

The average Arab villager probably seldom has much more. Sanitary conditions are better in most camps than in most villages, I am told. But these homeless Palestinian refugees, who include many persons who have lived at a much higher standard, all hold the UN responsible for their dispossession. What makes them additionally incensed is the bureaucratic manner in which relief is administered and the preposterous scale of salaries paid the western administrators. In fact, I wonder at the incredible docility of western taxpayers.

$10–$20-DAY EXPENSES

UN salaries are scaled to normal home salaries plus a per diem allowance ranging from $10 to $20 per day. The recipients have cars at their disposal, pay no income tax, get cigarettes, liquor, etc., free of customs and way below home prices. The theory is that otherwise no one would serve.

This is nonsense. Many educational, medical, and relief missions have operated for years in the Middle East at very modest salaries. They recruit idealistic- and socially-minded persons anxious to perform devoted service, or the intellectually eager welcoming opportunity for new experiences. The UN makes no such appeal and handing out other people's money becomes, for some, a racket. Why, for instance, should a $40-a-week American stenographer be taxed to pay a United Nations relief and work administration typist a tax-free income of $122 per week in places where living costs are considerably below those in America?

No European UNRWA employee gets less than $6,365 per year. Many of them live on per diem allowances and save their entire salaries. On the other hand native employees, doing the same work, and often more efficiently, receive a tiny fraction of the westerners' pay. An Arab trained nurse gets $45 per month and maintenance. A Swiss nurse gets (with allowances) $608 per month, or more than 13 times the Arab nurse's income. A European UNRWA laboratory technician gets $700 per month—more than an American colonel in regular service and three times the salary of the chief surgeon, a distinguished Arab, in the same hospital.

MORE PAY THAN GOVERNOR

A chief district relief officer gets $1,100 per month, or more than the Arab governor of the province.

The salary scales of all private western institutions are thrown way out of balance as a result. An UNRWA stenographer gets twice the income of a starting full professor at the American University of Beirut. The Quakers, YMCA's, Lutherans, and Catholic welfare organizations pay salaries which enable their people to live decently but austerely, and thus win immeasurably more affection and respect than the UN people.

They also attract a superior type of personality. I have met fine administrators in UNRWA, but the better they are the more they are in rebellion against the whole setup. And whenever one sees a camp showing a little love, sympathy, and comeliness, with gardens laid out, a decent school set up, and even floorless tents protected with low walls against seeping rains, one invariably finds that some voluntary organization has taken the lead in doing its administration.

The economic position of the western UN employee vis-à-vis the native makes the UN appear as another outpost of western imperialism the more glaring when westerners draw fat pay for handing out lean charity.

Power Is Our Best Friend Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. THYE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Power Is Our Best Friend Now," published in a recent issue of the Farm Journal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POWER IS OUR BEST FRIEND NOW

The new year calls for a new look. The Korean reverses have left us gloomy. The immediate future appears threatening. The prospect calls for honest appraisal and clear thinking, not for panicky discouragement.

After all, the United States continues to be by far the happiest, richest, and strongest of nations. We shall have no need to live in fear if we will make wise use of our strength.

Strength means many things. Right now it means military power—armed force so mighty that it must be feared. Military power includes agricultural and industrial ability to produce more and more food and munitions.

Our first national duty, therefore, must be to shape American strength into irresistible armies, navies, and air forces. We cannot afford to continue the now-fading illusion that we can protect America by buying friendships abroad. Impregnable power will bring us better friends than will lavish gifts.

We dare not shrink from the overshadowing fact that Communists intend eventually to conquer the United States if they can. They will conspire within our borders, steal our secrets, lure us into bloody, exhausting wars with their slave countries, trick us into wasting our strength; if they must, and when they dare, they will attack us directly.

We are fighting for survival as a nation, and for every American liberty and privilege we possess. If we use our great strength prudently, we shall win. Their people outnumber us, so we must avoid wasting our men. We should quickly adopt means to organize other anti-Communist manpower, such as Germans and Japanese, under our leadership. We should stimulate counter-efforts wherever possible within China and other countries, even within Russia—especially within Russia.

At home, we should insist that Congress squeeze every possible waste out of government, and spend only for power. Let's pound the lofty nonsense out of the State Department, and put common-sense Americanism in command.

Nor should we permit Government to forget that the greatest asset we have, the one which no enemy possesses, is the free American. Let us not weaken him by a set of second-rate totalitarian controls and restrictions.

Yes, the United States is rich and strong; but not rich enough nor strong enough for any effort not now essential to survival as a nation of free people.

Our National Leaders Should Avoid Arrogance, Belligerency, and a Sense of Infallibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, an open letter to President Truman was read by the Reverend T. T. Swearingen, pastor of the Oak Park Christian Church, in Kansas City, Mo., to the congregation on Sunday, December 24. The letter constitutes a powerful and significant comment on several aspects of the foreign policies now being pursued by the Truman administration.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This Christmas season brings many things other than happiness, such as the tragic sorrow in the homes of 42,000 American boys wounded, missing, or killed in Korea, and the ghostlike fear hovering over countless thousands of other homes where boys await induction. In the minds and hearts of these millions of Americans are two major questions:

First, what have we bought with these thousands of lives in Korea that has any permanent value; second, is there no better way?

SEE OTHER SOLUTIONS

The average American does not believe that continuing war is the only solution of the Korean situation, or that war with China leading into a third world war is inevitable. He likewise does not believe that democracy can be forced upon the peoples of the world, and for the United States to become an arsenal for that purpose is as stupid as one can expect war to be.

The American people are not opposed to preparation, nor are they unwilling to make great sacrifices. They demonstrated this in two major wars in this century. However, even those sacrifices have brought their disillusionment in the specter of war waste and its twin, our inability to buy peace with the currency of force.

We, the people, are trapped. We rear our sons for life and what they are offered is death. We elect national leaders and their only answer to international problems is the fight-at-the-drop-of-the-hat philosophy. Modern statesmanship seems to be the fine art of making age-old mistakes in newly refined ways. We, the people, are not as interested in saving our State Department's face as we are in saving the present crop of our finest youth and the peace of the world. We want some way, other than war, to be tried. It is never too late for that. Ultimately some kind of peace will be worked out around a conference table. Why not do that before millions are killed instead of afterward? We might take some risks through negotiation rather than all of them on the battlefield.

HOPE FOR RIGHT COURSE

These words are spoken in the prayerful hope that no false sense of national pride will move our Nation in the wrong direction even for good ends. It is the conviction of Christians that right ends will not be achieved by wrong means. When, better than at Christmas, should we be reminded of the age-old teaching that those who take the sword will perish by it?

Every true American respects the high office of the President of the United States and understands, in some small measure, the weight of responsibility which you, Mr. President, must carry. No small part of that responsibility, we believe, is to lead our Nation as a moral and spiritual force in the world, to demonstrate the power of right rather than the rights of power.

We pray that our national leaders, of whatever party, may avoid arrogance, belligerency and any sense of infallibility. That they may be guided more by the needs and hopes of our own citizens and the masses of people of other nations than by the selfish propaganda of their self-appointed spokesman. It is possible that the people of Korea and China do not want to fight us. Why not carry our cause to the people before determining to destroy them?

In the spirit of the Christmas season, may we avoid keeping Jesus forever in swaddling clothes, a baby to cuddle, but never a Saviour to follow, as Isaiah dreamed, with the government upon His shoulders.

Under Cover of War News State Department Selling Out American Economy at Torquay Conference

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a release from my office under date of December 27, 1950, entitled "Under Cover of War News State Department Selling Out American Economy at Torquay Conference."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 27, 1950.

"Americans are fighting an economic war as well as a military war and the State Department is the wrecking crew on both fronts," United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, charged today in a statement issued by his Washington office.

The Nevada Senator said that over 100 State Department men are now in England at a conference "which will complete plans for wrecking the American economic system."

"Some of these," Senator MALONE said, "possibly know what they are doing and are traitors, deliberately trying to wreck American industry and bring on communism, while the others are simply following orders from higher up." Continuing, Senator MALONE said: "If the State Department is successful in its war against American industry, the boys now at war in Korea—those who return—will return to a disrupted economic system wherein they cannot establish themselves.

"Under cover of war news, State Department personnel are now in Torquay, England, systematically selling out the American workers and investors by arranging tariff reductions which are a frontal attack on American industry.

"Knowing full well that 'free trade' will wreck American industry because American workers with their high standard of living cannot compete with foreign cheap labor and slave labor, the State Department crew go merrily along with their destructive plans. It is established that the Torquay, England, conference is further reducing tariff and import rates on hundreds of American-made items. Practically every State in the United States will be hurt.

"Rumor has it that the ITO, the International Trade Organization, which has been on President Truman's 'must' list for the past 2 years, has been abandoned in favor of completing the sell-out job at the Torquay Conference.

"Many American industries have already been badly hurt by the free-trade policy of the State Department. Watch factories in America have suffered; at least one has closed its doors. The American pottery industry is being killed. Makers of knitted berets have given up. Foreign-made cotton string gloves are forcing American glove workers out of jobs. American hatters have been forced to seek other employment. Shoe manufacturers say they cannot compete with foreign-made shoes dumped here at around 90 cents a pair. Seventy-five percent of the mines have closed down. This is only the beginning. Other American industries suffering from the administration's attack are: textiles and textile machinery, woolens and worsted, cotton broad woven goods, silk piece goods, crude petroleum products, aluminum, zinc, lead ores and bullion, sea foods, clothes pins, leather gloves and bags, rolling mill products, and numerous others.

"This destruction has been wrought by the 1934 Trade Agreements Act. The so-called escape clause in the 1934 Trade Agreements Act proved to be no escape to the threatened industries in this country. The so-called peril-point provision is a snare and delusion; in case of a test it would mean nothing, because it provides only that when the peril point is reached the President write a letter to Congress.

"Any stimulation in American industries due to the war emergency is of temporary duration and will not strengthen the peacetime economy. As a matter of fact, it is because of the administration's foreign-trade policy and other attacks on American industry that we must depend upon a war economy for so-called good times; it is because of these administration policies that the American worker and investor cannot now maintain the peacetime standard of living.

"We must take steps to assure a strong America economically, to halt the policy which not only weakens our positions abroad but dissipates our industries at home. This can be done by forcing the administration and particularly its State Department to stop its war against American workingmen and investors.

"The American people should make their voices heard in demanding that the Torquay Conference be stopped, that wholesale tariff reductions be halted to protect our American economy. In the new Congress they should demand that a stop be put to further extension of the 1934 Trade Agreements Act, which expires in June of 1951. They should demand that in its place there be established a flexible import fee principle under which American workers and investors—American industry—be protected against the flood of slave-labor products. Only by some such means can the American economic system be saved."

Senator MALONE concluded:

"Let us fight on the economic front for America as valiantly as our boys in Korea are fighting for their ideals. Only by upholding these ideals can we expect to retain the respect of the boys at the front."

Republican Demands for Greater Share in Shaping Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES P. KEM
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix to the RECORD an editorial published in the Springfield (Mo.) Bias on December 13, 1950, written by the editor, George Olds,

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Truman evidently intends to pay the least possible attention to Republican demands for a greater share in shaping our foreign policy. Since our foreign policy has quite a bearing on our lives and fortunes, the Republican appeal seems reasonable enough. Particularly when at least half of the people of America, and perhaps more than half, are Republicans, or at least not Democrats.

It is one of the dismaying aspects of our times that millions of Americans have no authoritative voice in decisions that will affect our civilization for decades.

President Truman's cavalier attitude, his sometimes haughty, sometimes breezy, disregard of the technically minority party, is a frightening thing.

There are times when it is permissible, perhaps even fitting, for a President to be narrowly partisan but these hardly are the times. These are the gravest times in our history, and we need every ounce of cooperation, every smidgeon of brains that we can muster, and the Republican leadership, I would say, is not completely devoid of brains.

Think how heartening it would have been to the country, and how helpful to the President's prestige if he had invited Republican leaders to sit in on his conferences with Premier Attlee and the military experts of Britain and the United States. Certainly they were entitled to admittance, certainly the problems under discussion are the problems of all Americans.

The recent election virtually repudiated the Truman administration and a big man would recognize that fact and adjust his policies and methods accordingly.

I am reminded of the story of the Democrat who surveyed the election returns and remarked, "We Democrats took a whale of a licking—thank God."

President Truman, from the very start of the Korean campaign, has acted without the advice and consent of Congress; he has kept even the leaders of his own party in ignorance of his plans and policies. And that way lies madness and disaster.

Governor Dewey's Senate Information Second-Hand

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, a release from my office regarding a dispatch entitled "Governor Dewey's Senate Information Second-Hand."

There being no objection, the release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 12, 1950.

United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE (Republican, Nevada) said today that Governor Dewey's statement regarding Secretary of State Dean Acheson did not represent his views or the views of Republicans generally.

"Governor Dewey was speaking for himself alone," Senator MALONE said, "when he suggested that Republicans withhold criticism of Secretary Acheson. His information from the Senate floor is necessarily second-hand. My mail is heavy and the demand of the people is that we continue to expose weaknesses in the administration which are resulting in the murdering of American boys.

"Secretary Acheson has not abandoned his 1949 decision to accept Communist China in the United Nations and to turn Formosa over to the Reds.

"To suggest that United States Senators and Representatives withhold expressing the people's opinions regarding the actions of any Government official is to suggest that we abandon our responsibility to the people who elected us.

"It is our duty to call the attention of the public to what is wrong in our Government. We are not going to straighten out a deplorable situation by trying to ignore it. Part of the trouble we are facing today is due to the fact that the people have not been properly informed as to what has been going on in their Government."

Senator MALONE said that he was not going to join in any plan which would tend to prevent his serving his constituents and the people of the United States as his conscience dictates.

Continuing, the Nevada Senator said: "Our boys are facing the Communists on the war front. It is our duty here on the home front to clean out the Communists and Communist friends in our Government structure. We must set an example at home to be effective abroad. The good citizens of this country do not expect the camp followers and the me-too advocates to dominate their Republican leaders."

Lt. Harry E. Sutton, American Hero

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, there have been many examples of the bravery and loyalty of our Negro servicemen in the past; many times they have gone unnoticed.

The story of a gallant Negro infantry platoon which fought off one of the most threatening approaches to a Communist break-through into the Hungnam beachhead is dramatically told in the New York Times of December 22.

Lt. Harry E. Sutton, who resides in my congressional district, is a fine soldier. He brilliantly led the United States unit when the North Koreans made their attack. Only the greatest bravery and excellent strategy on the part of Lieutenant Sutton and his men made it possible for them to hold the line and finally drive off the enemy.

Too little credit has been given our colored units in the past. I am, therefore, inserting the article in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the Members of this House may read it, and know of the outstanding contribution being made by our colored troops. I should also like them to know how proud the people of my congressional district are of this great feat of heroism on the part of Lieutenant Sutton. The article follows:

NEGRO UNIT HAILED ON HUNGNAM STAND—PLATOON LED BY BRONX OFFICER STAVED OFF MOST SERIOUS THREAT TO BEACHHEAD

WITH UNITED STATES THIRD DIVISION IN KOREA, December 20.—A gallant Negro Infantry platoon fought off the most threatening approach yet to a Communist breakthrough into the Hungnam beachhead.

The United States unit was led by Lt. Harry E. Sutton, of 1100 Franklin Avenue, the Bronx, New York, when the North Koreans made their wild charge.

The Red assault disintegrated when each United States soldier was down to his last ammunition clip of eight bullets. That's how close the Communists came to penetrating at least the outer United Nations defense ring.

The savage battle of "Sutton's Ridge" began before dawn Monday. The United States counterattack ended Tuesday noon.

Since then the United States troops have shifted positions. The story now can be told without endangering security.

A famous Third Division regiment was holding part of the hilly eastern flank of the beachhead. Lieutenant Sutton's platoon was assigned to a long, three-humped ridge.

Lieutenant Sutton has been a soldier a long time and an Infantry lieutenant 5 years. He spotted his men in strong points on the three ridge nipples and along the World War I type trenches that civilian workers had gouged in the frozen earth.

He was worried. Fresh North Korean soldiers—reorganized, reequipped, and fanatic—were on the next ridge line over. On his right flank they had strong-pointed a hill that surrounding crags masked from United States artillery.

At 7:45 a. m. Monday the Communists struck. Crawling up the bare windswept ridge came 3 groups of 20 men—1 group on each flank, 1 dead center. Just a small attack, but made by ferocious men who would not stop even when wounded.

The United States soldiers moved back and forth in their old-fashioned trench, picking off the Reds.

"But they kept coming and coming," Lieutenant Sutton said. "All day small groups of them kept coming. We would wipe out this bunch and before we knew it the Reds were back again."

The Communists from the ridge line opposite tried to pin down Lieutenant Sutton's men with fire so the assault groups could reach the trench line. The Reds were firing captured United States Browning automatic rifles, machine guns, and Garand rifles.

Master Sgt. Tyler Collins, of Malone, Fla., stood bolt upright and picked off seven Communists. A bazooka man killed 10 with a single shell. But the Reds kept coming for more than 11 hours. Finally, at 7 p. m., there was a break.

"We have licked them," the GI's told each other, jubilantly.

The Communists began using small arms again from the opposite ridge. There was no assault this time, just the continual bark of snipers' rifles through the long, frigid night.

At 6 p. m. Tuesday the Reds assaulted "Sutton Ridge." From the ridge opposite the center of the line came a fierce wall of fire.

A suicide enemy force struck up the slope against the left flank.

Lieutenant Sutton was not too worried about these two fronts—the massed fire power of United States artillery could hit there.

But from the hill on the right—masked from the guns by the other hills—the main force of the enemy was assaulting in the darkness. The Reds were coming down a precipitious slope, tying short fiber ropes on scrub pines and lowering themselves.

With flashing bayonets they burst into the strong point on the last of the three nipples on Lieutenant Sutton's ridge. The GI's there fought desperately. Later in one foxhole Lieutenant Sutton found two dead North Koreans and the body of the United States soldier who had killed them before he died.

Once inside the trenches, the Reds turned the United States soldiers' own machine guns down the ridge line.

Pfc Elijah Whitley, of Toledo, Ark., replied with his Browning automatic rifle, silencing the machine gun. Along the ridge line Lieutenant Sutton and his men rolled hand grenades down the slope. In the breaking dawn they could see the Communists crumple and tumble down the slope and then see new men replace them. Bodies were strewn crazily on the slopes.

"We gave them everything we had," Lieutenant Sutton said.

That was enough. The last fanatic charge disintegrated.

Reinforcements reached the United States line. United States mortars thumped down on the enemy-held right-hand ridge nipple. Lieutenant Sutton led a counter attack. The enemy was driven off, and Lieutenant Sutton's men again held all of the ridge.

MRS. SUTTON VOICES PRIDE

Holding her 8-month-old daughter, Linda Louise in her arms and flanked by her other child, Harry E. Sutton, Jr., Mrs. Vadnie Sutton could only say last night: "I'm terribly proud of my husband." Through the day she had heard over the radio and read in the newspapers about the heroic exploit of her husband, First Lt. Harry E. Sutton.

Neighbors crowded her small apartment and offered congratulations. Mrs. Sutton, born in this city, said her husband had been with the United States Army for 10 years.

Malone Assails Attlee for Role in Parley Here

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an editorial entitled "Malone Assails Attlee for Role in Parley Here," published in the Washington Times-Herald of December 6, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MALONE ASSAILS ATTLEE FOR ROLE IN PARLEY HERE

Senator MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, said yesterday that the visit of British Prime Minister Attlee is a step in a Franco-British plan to "sell out the American Army in Korea."

The visit, MALONE said in a statement, "is for the purpose of keeping intact the colonial possessions of those two countries through the recognition of Communist China.

"They are calling on us now through Mr. Attlee, only to protect their investments in Britain's Hong Kong and Singapore and France's Indochina," MALONE said.

MALONE predicted that Attlee will suggest that we end the war by withdrawing from Korea and Formosa, "turning our backs on the Chinese Nationalists," and recognizing the Communist regime in China.

PREDICTS WE'LL DO IT

"Thus the end of the war, temporarily, until Russia is in better shape to fight us," he said.

"I prophesy now that we will do exactly what England and France tell us to do, for we still have officials without the backbone to stand up to European leaders," MALONE said.

Senator EASTLAND, Democrat, of Mississippi, called on the administration to drive out "Communist sympathizers opposed to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek," and then join with Chiang in opening a second front in China.

COULD TURN INTO VICTORY

With the Chinese Communist Armies concentrated in Korea, EASTLAND said, the Korean disaster could be turned into a victory. EASTLAND outlined this plan in a Senate speech.

1. Arm Chiang's Nationalist forces on Formosa for opening a second front on the Communist-held Chinese mainland, and give assistance to the 1,000,000 anti-Communist guerrillas waiting there to join Chiang.

2. Establish a naval blockade of the Chinese coast.

3. Send American planes to destroy the railways on which the Communists must transport supplies from Manchuria and the Manchurian arsenals.

Senator TAFT, Republican, of Ohio, called on President Truman to stop hiding the facts of the Korean crisis from Congress and the American people. TAFT said the President should report directly to the people immediately after his conferences with Attlee.

The People Are Gradually Finding Out the Truth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, eventually the sovereign people of this country will learn the truth with reference to the load they are carrying in the way of taxes to support the United Nations. It will soon become apparent to them that the American taxpayers are furnishing the money and the men, while the United Nations gives the orders that are costing the lives of thousands of our fine boys, to say nothing about the injuries which have been sustained by more than 30,000 of our boys, not under the American flag, but under the United Nations flag.

Under leave to extend, heretofore granted, I am inserting in the RECORD a very interesting article by Fulton Lewis, Jr., which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of December 31, 1950:

WASHINGTON REPORT

(By Fulton Lewis, Jr.)

A new year is knocking at the door, and another decade goes down in the history books. And it goes down, I might say, as a 10-year stretch of turmoil in which we as a nation managed to demonstrate conclusively the championship title as prize international dolts.

Onetime Ambassador Joseph Kennedy tagged an apt label on the outgoing decade. He called it a period of staggering extravagance. A perusal of the cost accounts for our past 10 years of neighborliness indicates that he's about right.

Mr. Kennedy, I note, asks what the next decade will bring. The best I can do is take a quick look at the past one and, upon recovery from the resulting shudders, hope for the best.

Now that we've got our own Christmas bills to worry about, it probably will seem less than staggering to read that since 1940, as taxpayers, we scattered $51,764,500,006 around the globe. That's billions, and it went to 14 nations in one form or another, and we have a sum total of nothing to show for it.

The British since 1940 got $36,248,000,000 and are coming up for another $2,000,000,000 this year.

France got $9,468,000,000; Netherlands, $1,168,000,000; Belgium, $668,000,000; Turkey, $294,000,000; Canada, $6,500,000; Greece, $1,217,000,000; Australia, $1,700,000; Sweden, $62,000,000; Norway, $224,000,000; Denmark, $175,000,000; Ethiopia, $1,000,000; Iceland, $10,000,000; and India, $200,000,000.

That kind of money ought to make a lot of friends, if handouts can buy friendships. At any rate the United States is going to spend a lot more, probably another $100,000,000,000, to arm Western Europe.

There are a lot of experts who think most of this should be spent in the United States of America, in maintaining and equipping the biggest defense army in history. However, the decision has been made to spend most of it in Europe, and in the next 10 years we will know whether it is right or wrong.

Reports that Soviet armies are being concentrated and huge guided missile platforms are being built for an assault on Alaska and Canada continued to slip through the military secrecy screen. But nevertheless, our security plans called for nothing more than a holding force in the North and in Asia.

Those we have helped in Europe since 1940 with $51,764,500,000 seem to hold the view that Asia is a secondary theater of war and of little concern to them.

Kennedy made this clear with a few statistics revealing the size of European military effort to help us in Korea.

India has sent no troops, one field ambulance unit, and negotiations are under way for 400,000 jute bags.

Ethiopia has offered $100,000 and 1,000 men. Neither offer was accepted.

Denmark sent one hospital ship, medical supplies, and 500 tons of sugar.

Norway sent a few merchant ships, no fighting men. Sweden sent one hospital unit.

Australia has 1,000 infantrymen in Korea, 40 fighter planes, two destroyers, one frigate, and medical supplies.

Greece sent 800 troops, six planes. Canada sent 15,000 fighting men, one air transport squadron, three destroyers. She has 10,000 men in training, earmarked for the Far East.

Turkey has one infantry combat team of 5,000 men in action. Belgium has 1,000 men, en route to Korea, plus 400 tons of sugar and medical supplies.

The Netherlands sent an infantry battalion and one destroyer.

France has supplied an infantry battalion of 1,000 men, one gunboat and medical supplies.

England has 6,000 ground troops in the area, one aircraft carrier, four cruisers, seven destroyers, and eight frigates.

The bulk of all the forces of the countries listed stayed at home. Only the United States stripped itself of fighting men for the war in Korea, to the tune of 100,000 soldiers and marines.

Justice for Poland

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. HESELTON
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include a recent address by David J. Dallin, contributing editor of the New Leader, as one of an excellent series of radio programs sponsored by the Western Massachusetts Branch of the Polish American Congress, Inc. It is well worthy of careful reading, particularly as we start this new year which surely will bring the necessity of sound decisions on the many complex problems facing the world today.

I would like to emphasize one important statement in this speech, which must be constantly kept foremost in the minds of all who have any responsibility for the establishment and preservation of peace. It is: "For our generation Poland remains a moral issue of the first magnitude; there will be no peace until this issue is resolved." Mr. Dallin's address follows:

Poland is one of the gravest of the moral issues of our times. In other contemporary problems, political, economic, racial, or religious aspects prevail, but in the case of Poland the appeal is to the conscience of mankind, and this tragic role has been hers now for over 150 years. Beginning with the Napoleonic wars and continuing during the martyrdom of the nineteenth century, the Polish issue provoked the deepest emotions in the Western World—until the nation was finally restored in 1918. The national status was maintained for only two decades, and then the new war started. Poland again appealed to the conscience when she fell prey to German aggression, again when Soviet troops marched in, when Nazi massacres of her intellectuals became known, when the rumors that 10,000 of her officer-prisoners of war had been murdered in cold blood on orders of the Soviet Government were confirmed. Then occurred the shameful western appeasement of Moscow at the expense of Poland, when London and Washington forgot their pledges and statesmen betrayed their ally in the vain hope of buying peace for their nations by throwing Poland to the wolves. Then history proved that no peace can be bought at such a price. The international tensions of our time and the general expectation of a new war are the reward for the shortsightedness, nay blindness, manifested by western leaders at the end of World War II.

If there should be war, Poland will be one of the great issues. At present Poland is a province of the Soviet empire; deprived of independence, she enjoys as many rights as the allegedly autonomous Bashkirs of the Volga and the Yakuts deep in Siberia; under Soviet domination Poles have the right to praise Stalin in Polish, whereas under the Tsars they had to praise the Tsar in Russian. This is the extent of the difference.

To the oppressive rational system of Tsarist times has been added a new great hypocrisy; old Russia and old Prussia did not claim that their Poles enjoyed self-government and national freedom; today, however, every Pole is obliged, in addition to observing Soviet-prescribed law, to pretend that his nation is free and self-governing, that freedom of press and freedom of religion exist in Poland, and that the standard of living has risen substantially since the sun of the Soviet constitution started to shine on the tormented country.

This hypocrisy of the Soviet leaders and their puppets is morally repulsive. Brutal truth is easier to endure than deceit and lies. The Polish Government, we know, is a Communist government, but it never admits to being such. The Polish Army is run by Soviet generals, but it claims to be purely national-Polish. Polish foreign policy is nonexistent, having been replaced by blueprints and orders from Moscow, but Poland does have a minister with a large staff, diplomatic representatives, and a host of delegates who enjoy greatly their trips to all kinds of international rallies. Poland's political police organization is kept under strict surveillance by Soviet instructors from the MVD-MGB, but it pretends to be independent and to have achieved in 5 years what the Soviet GPU worked at during two decades—false trials, false confessions, and a network of slave labor camps.

This odor of hypocrisy is perhaps the most repulsive feature of the present Polish regime. Among themselves, the Polish leaders, as well as the Soviet bosses, are frank, cynical, contemptuous; they know the truth. Many bitter jokes and pointed anecdotes about alleged Polish independence are in circulation. When I was in Europe last year, a former Soviet officer, now a DP, told me how he was ordered, a short time before the end of the war, to return from the German front, enter a Polish school, don a Polish uniform, and become a Polish commander; he was also ordered to give up his original Russian-sounding name and assume an esteemed Polish family name. When the group of allegedly Polish officers stayed in Moscow, all of them, including the atheists and Jews, were obliged to attend a Catholic Church service, where they had to kiss the cross in the hands of the priest. Almost all of them were Communists. An anecdote was being told about the young officer who, when his turn came, approached the priest and whispered to him, "Excuse me, Father, I can't, I have been a Communist for 4 years now." To which the priest answered, also in a whisper, "Kiss, you fool, I have been a Communist for 20 years."—and the photograph of this ceremony was then sent to Poland to impress the good Catholics.

The same hyprocrisy is at the basis of the most important development in Poland in the last year—the appointment of Soviet Marshal Rokossovsky as Poland's Minister of War and, of course, member of the Politburo of the Communist Party of Poland, hypocritically called Workers Party. Almost all the leading posts in the Polish army have been given over to Soviet generals whose names were changed to sound Polish: General Korzhyc (vice minister of defense and chief of staff); General Sivitsky (Korzhic's deputy); General Poplavski (under secretary of war); General Romejko (air force); Torkevich, Pultuzhytski and Strashevski (military district commanders); Sennitski (commander of land forces). About 600 high-ranking Soviet military men became actual commanders in the Polish Army. Simultaneously with the announcement of Rokossovsky's appointment, all Polish Communist leaders suspected of opposition to close ties with the Soviet Union were purged from the government and the army, the first among them being the potential Tito of Poland—Wladislaw Gomulko.

The new set-up was very similar to the old Russian imperial set-up, but since Stalin wished to maintain the appearance of a sovereign Poland, the elevation of Marshal Rokossovsky had to be presented as a unique act of purely personal nature; the reason given for taking this step was that President Bierut of Poland had requested the Soviet Government if possible to place the marshal at the disposal of Poland and the Soviet Government in view of the friendly relations between the two nations, agreed to comply.

It would be out of the question for Stalin's government to relinquish Poland to the Poles. Poland is Russia's main road to the west, to Germany and beyond, and any Russian government which intends to operate in the west must control Poland. For the right to use this road, Lenin fought a war in 1920; along with German generals he plotted a new war in 1922. In 1939, when Hitler was about to upset the balance of Europe, Stalin's first thought was of Poland, and his first invasion was into Poland. In 1944-45, when Stalin decided to set up his own government in Poland, the first serious cleavage between him and his allies became inevitable. Today, too, Stalin's strength in Europe hinges on his dominance over Poland, and he would risk a war rather than restore Polish independence.

For our generation Poland remains a moral issue of the first magnitude; there will be no peace until this issue is resolved. In a way, history is a race between expediency and lofty principles, between power and conscience, between cynicism and idealism. In the long run naked power has never been victorious; its successes have been temporary and transitory.

And they will be so in the case of Poland. Sacrifices will be exacted, blood will be spilled, bitter fighting will be inevitable. But freedom is certain to win over the forces of darkness and oppression.

Malone Backs Hearst on UN Betrayal of United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "Backs Hearst on UN Betrayal of United States," published in the New York Journal-American of December 26, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BACKS HEARST ON UN BETRAYAL OF UNITED STATES

(By Dan Markel)

WASHINGTON, December 26.—William Randolph Hearst is 100 percent right in his statement in Sunday's New York Journal-American and other Hearst newspapers that United Nations "unity is betraying the interests of the United States," Senator GEORGE W. MALONE (Republican, Nevada) declared.

He said:

"Mr. Hearst should be commended by every right-thinking American for calling the Nation's attention to Britain's rubber shipments to Russia as a prime example of United Nations 'unity.'"

Senator MALONE referred to the signed editorial by Mr. Hearst titled "A Tragic Unity" which said in part:

"I think shipments of rubber to Russia at a time when Russia is supplying arms and much needed equipment to the Chinese armies which are slaughtering the boys from the United States is a fair example of the unity which prevails in the United Nations."

MALONE said British trade with Russia is forcing the United States to pay record prices for natural rubber needed to build our own defense.

Russian purchases with tin have also caused tin prices to skyrocket, he pointed out, adding:

"The British have us on the hip.

"To them Russian gold, produced by Russia's slave labor, is as good as ours, and sometimes they seem to think it is better.

"Britain and her traders are open to the highest bidder.

"As long ago as November 1948, when I was in Singapore on a tour to see what deals our supposed friends were making with the Communists, I found the British shipping sizable quantities of tin and rubber to Soviet Russia.

"They've shipped tin and rubber to Communist Russia ever since.

"They're still shipping while Russian planes and military equipment are killing our boys in Korea."

DECLARED A TRAGEDY

"Mr. Hearst rightly declares 'it is a tragedy that President Truman tolerates such base betrayal of our country and our people by these supposed allies.'

"It is a tragedy that the Senate and Congress allowed themselves to get roped in by schemes to support these so-called allies in the first place.

"There is not 1 of the 16 nations of Europe that has been receiving our largesse under ECA, with the possible exception of Sweden, that has not been selling goods to Russia whenever and as much as they can.

"Months ago I exposed on the floor of the Senate the 96 trade treaties these Marshall plan-United Nations countries have with Russia.

"The British were trading with Russia and planning more trade when Britain applied for its first multibillion-dollar loan, and later, when it came to us for other billions in ECA hand-outs.

"Britain and France had even entered into nonaggression pacts with Russia. Congress, under administration pressure, went right on with its too late to do something about hand-outs.

"The hour is late but not it.

"First we should stop all aid and assistance to any nation that is helping Russia and her satellites consolidate their gains and prepare for world war III.

"We should enter into long-term contracts with Brazil and the other countries of the Western Hemisphere that produce natural rubber for their entire output, even if we must pay a higher price.

"We should produce synthetic rubber to our utmost capacity.

"Then let the British try their squeeze."

Our Power Was Never Greater, Our National Honor Never Brighter

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ISIDORE DOLLINGER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. DOLLINGER. Mr. Speaker, a great many Americans started the New Year with a gloomy outlook, so it was very heartening to read the message from Walter Winchell which appeared in the New York Daily Mirror of January 1, 1951, and which gives us a ray of sunshine.

Walter Winchell has fought for many years against isms which are un-American. In his article, he eloquently and in a few well-chosen words crystallized the issues which seriously concern the American people today, and gave us reassurance that this land of ours still is, and will continue to be, the world's greatest arsenal in the battle for democracy. From this, people the world over who cherish freedom can take heart and know that no ideology foreign to our American ideals will be allowed to flourish—and that we can and will continue to wield our influence in the cause of democracy.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include Mr. Winchell's article, so that the Members of this House may have an opportunity to read it. It follows:

Mr. and Mrs. United States, things look bad for our country, I know. Many experts who do not know what they are talking about are now as unreasonably gloomy as they once were absurdly cheerful.

The truth is that in the secret history of the world, our final power was never greater, and our national honor never brighter. The fact is our secret weapons are so powerful—that out of common humanity we will not use them—except in extreme necessity. This Nation can defeat any other nation or combination of nations in the world, if it comes to a matter of survival. We not only can defeat the Communists as a nation—we can obliterate the Russians as a people.

In our secret arsenals are enough weapons to remove every Russian city of over 100,000 population from the map. Within easy striking distance of our foreign bases we could vaporize 50,000,000 Russians in one mass bombing. We know what the Russians have in secret weapons—but compared to ours they don't amount to a fourth of July firecracker.

That is also true of Korea. We could burn out the Red Chinese army in Korea tonight—and the only reason we don't do it is that we would not think of killing the 29,000,000 Koreans we are going to liberate. We could incinerate the Kremlin faster than we could free Korea. But the 50,000,000 Russians we could kill—25,000,000 would be children. And it is not our tradition to attack babies.

Stalin knows that the very second the artillery of his field armies rolls west on Europe—something is going to roar north from the Mediterranean. And the black hole in the earth—which was once Moscow—will be the only evidence left of the blackness of his crime.

Malone Hits Tariff Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, an article entitled "MALONE Hits Tariff Policy," published in the New York Journal-American of December 27, 1950.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHARGES STATE DEPARTMENT IS SELLING OUT UNITED STATES—MALONE HITS TARIFF POLICY

Senator MALONE charged that more than 100 State Department employees now are in England selling out American workers and investors by making tariff concessions to other nations.

The Nevada Republican said an international trade conference now going on at Torquay, England, "will complete plans for wrecking the American economic system.

"Americans are fighting an economic war as well as a military war and the State Department is the wrecking crew on both fronts," MALONE said.

Representatives of more than 30 nations are attending the Torquay conference. Six other countries are seeking to have a part in any agreement reached.

WOULD KILL TRADE ACT

MALONE called on the Eighty-second Congress, convening January 3, to let the 1934 Trade Agreement Act die next June 30.

He said the administration has been using this law to make tariff concessions which he said have badly hurt many American industries.

"We must take steps to assure a strong America economically, to halt the policy which not only weakens our positions abroad but dissipates our industries at home," MALONE said. "This can be done by forcing the administration and particularly its State Department to stop its war against American workingmen and investors."

MALONE has long advocated a flexible import-fee principle for the United States in dealing with other nations. Such a system would take into account any difference in living standards in setting tariffs on goods coming into this country.

Time: 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS B. HELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Walter Winchell in the New York Daily Mirror of January 2, 1951:

TIME: 1951

Time is a mysterious process moving inexorably from infinity to eternity. Civilization is as ancient as the oceans and as new as tomorrow. A split second holds the past, present, and future. The serene instant when night and day are balanced marks the end of 1 day as well as the start of another. Tomorrow is woven out of the thread of yesterday.

You can appreciate the miracle of time by realizing the millions of years of evolution it has taken to carve the human hand.

It is well to remember that clocks and calendars are not the sole yardsticks of time. They are gadgets designed to regulate our daily existence. Time has no dates or hours.

Philosophers are aware that the yardstick of time varies with the conditions of our existence. A moment of agony is longer than an hour of bliss. A year of slavery longer than a decade of liberty. A million years is only a wink to an astronomer. Yet a decision a diplomat makes in a moment can affect thousands of years of history.

Time's strangest aspect is that nations existing in 1951—live in different ages. Atomic ingenuity mingles with prehistoric hatreds. It is 1951 in Moscow—but the spirit of communism lives in a cave. Politically and spiritually some nations are still in the Middle Ages. Over the roar of jet-propelled planes you can hear the steady throb of medieval tom-toms.

What has humanity got to show for 1,950 years of civilization? Fabulous cities, wondrous machines, incredible scientific accomplishments. There are marvels winging through the skies and flowing through test tubes. Mechanical magic galore. Material miracles that could defy the imagination of angels.

There has been great progress in curing ills of the flesh. Yet the spiritual maladies remain largely unconquered.

Amid humanity's most startling material achievements, a shocking paradox exists. Within the glitter of shimmering cities are grim shadows. In the most modern metropolis you can find luxury and poverty side by side.

Many who live in the same city don't inhabit the same world. Many who live in the same world don't exist in the same age.

The most obvious fact of modern life is also its most crushing problem: Mankind moves forward materially like a rocket while spiritual progress is no swifter than a paralytic turtle. Just gaze at the front pages: Page 1 indicates a global holocaust; page 2 heralds another triumph in the fight against disease.

Time has caused massive geographical changes. The years have changed the shape of continents, the contour of oceans and carved mighty canyons. Vast distances have been shortened. But when will we bridge the distances separating human hearts?

Down through the ages one fact has remained crystal clear: Human progress is never achieved easily or swiftly. There are no short cuts to Paradise. Mankind has moved forward by surmounting obstacles. Every human right is the result of sacrifices.

Progress comes from men of vision, faith, and courage who have dared face a challenge. Humanity never advances to the tune of brass bands. The banners of progress are tattered uniforms; its medals are scars and its only music is the heartbeat of brave humans. Before history is inscribed with ink—it is written in blood.

The agonized cries of the minutemen made possible our liberty—not the lilting strains of Yankee Doodle. What the twentieth century can learn from the past is that only courage and hardship will guarantee the survival of humanity in the twenty-first century.

The club was once a mighty weapon—today it is the atomic bomb. But whether people live in an age of bows and arrows or supersonic rockets—the essential decency of the human spirit has remained timeless.

The human spirit has been powered by a constant striving for a better way of life. Which explains why the Ten Commandments have remained more potent than all of history's tyrants—and their armies.

The immortality of the spirit is mankind's brightest hope—because it insures the inevitable disintegration of despotism. Time can shrivel the skin and still the heart, but the teachings of a Man born 1,950 years ago are everlasting. There is more power in the Golden Rule than in a mountain of uranium. And the precepts of the Bible have done more to unite people everywhere than all the treaties, pacts, and charters. The fundamental religious truths have survived wars, earthquakes, and famines. Catastrophe follows catastrophe, as waves break upon the shore. Yet the storms of human tragedies never wrecked the foundation of spiritual strength. And only upon that foundation can we erect a better way of life.

None should forget this compelling fact of civilization: When compared with the age of the seas, humanity is still in its dawn. There is still time to mold a world where no man lives in fear, and children grow up in peace.

It takes just a modicum of realism to understand that time is neutral. It is not a servant, but must be mastered. It fights on the side that best utilizes it. It takes courage and patience and valor to move onward. A hundred hammer blows may smash a rock. Yet the blow that finally shatters it is no more vital than those that preceded it. Tyranny, like cancer, still hasn't been conquered. Because it is a lengthy struggle is no reason for surrendering. The cure for diseases, which scientists have been working on for centuries, may be discovered tomorrow morning.

The great ally of tyranny is complacency. Time wasted by decent men adds time to the lives of despots. Every human act is a ripple which eventually reaches the far shores of history. For history is the total biography of every man who lives—and has lived.

This Nation's history offers the most striking illustration of the ageless force of justice. The faith that overcame the rigors of Valley Forge made possible the triumph of Iwo Jima. George Washington's flaming spirit burned within Abraham Lincoln and was carried like a torch by Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Most Americans have never ceased battling for the ideals that motivated the minutemen. Jefferson's ringing words still find echoes in the hearts of Americans today. The ride Paul Revere started has never really ended.

If there are Americans fighting for liberty in the fortieth century—it will still be 1776.

Isolationism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. REVA BECK BOSONE

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

CAMP POLK, LA., December 24, 1950.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BOSONE: When it became apparent that the Communists had selected force as a means of further expanding their power, I closed my law office in Heber and joined the Forty-fifth Infantry Division, where I had served during the last war. It was most encouraging to find myself among old friends, all anxious to do their best to preserve our Nation. We have really worked hard at it—from about 5:45 to 6 p. m. or 7 or 8 or 9 every day.

Practically all of our officers and many of our noncoms are combat veterans—not anxious to get killed, but determined to protect America. But, Judge, of late a terrible thing has raised its head. Isolationism—first Herbert Hoover, then KENNETH WHERRY have trumpeted the watch-cries of the cult. It has taken a slightly new form—i. e., our Navy and Air Force can save us, we don't have to risk our necks or spend our blessed money.

In the first place they are wrong from a military point of view. If we can't stop the Russians in Europe with all the French and British et al. to help us, we will be in a tough spot at home without their help. Because of the courageous and determined leadership of F. D. R. and Henry Stimson et al. and the 250,000 American men who gave their lives in the last war, we have won a series of bases remote from our homeland which enable us to meet the aggressors far from home. Judge, I saw the wrecked towns in Italy, France, and Germany. I saw the terror in the eyes of people whose land had been fought over. I don't want this to happen to my home or to my family. And I saw the boxcars of corpses at Dachau and the gas chambers. I don't intend to cower here until they select me for execution next.

We have a great, powerful Nation, with great, powerful friends. Those with courage enough to face the realities of our situation must shout and make themselves heard above the cowardly whimperings of the Hoovers and Wherrys. General Collins knows what we can do. He so testified just the other day.

Isn't it ironical that the Republicans, who were so busy accusing the Democrats of coddling the Communists as long as that served the purpose of helping them to preserve their precious money, now turn out to be the isolationists when it takes courage and sacrifice to deal with the real Communist threat.

I'm writing this rather long letter to you as a personal friend whom I have long respected. I hope it will be of some assistance to you in the performance of your weighty responsibilities during the next few months. I so hope you can stop those cowards from denying us the one real opportunity of protecting our homes and preserving democracy.

Most sincerely,

GLEN M. HATCH, JR.,
Captain, One Hundred and Sixtieth Field Artillery Battalion.

Some Thoughts About 1951

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Ed Sullivan, from the New York Daily News of January 1, 1951:

SOME THOUGHTS ABOUT 1951
(By Ed Sullivan)

When some people in show business, always considered good citizens, permit their names to spearhead heated opposition to a loyalty oath, you marvel at the stupidity which enrolls their names and reputations on such sucker lists.

In a national emergency, when Washington experience has demonstrated that loyalties are questionable, it is for the good of the individual and the country to proclaim his loyalty.

A loyalty oath is no infringement of freedom or liberty.

Rather, it is one of the duties inherent in the citizenship contract, a contract you ratify by accepting all of the vital privileges insured by the Constitution—military protection, education, health services, trial by jury, freedom of speech, freedom of press, freedom of religion.

It is tremendously significant that article VI, of the original seven articles of the Constitution, demanded that all national and State officers shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the Constitution.

When the young Nation protested that the Constitution was not sufficiently explicit as to individual and State rights 10 original amendments were added.

Article I, defining freedom of religion, of speech, of press, and the right to petition, did not alter the necessity for Federal and State officials taking an oath of loyalty. The founding fathers recognized the necessity for such an oath of loyalty, just as we can recognize it in 1951.

In 1951, some people of show business would do well to learn the true meaning of loyalty and patriotism, and never forget the deeper implications.

During World War II, this reporter happened to be at a Marine base, down South, when a division was about to shove off for the Pacific. The speaker was a New Yorker, Monsignor Robert E. McCormick, and he selected as his theme the Marine motto: Semper Fidelis—Always Faithful.

Out of that came his analysis and definition of loyalty and patriotism.

"Loyalty," he told them, "means being always faithful to a lawful government.

"Loyalty comes from a reasoned conviction. It is the result and accompaniment of human reason telling a person to adhere to the laws and customs of his country.

"Loyalty is the basis on which patriotism is founded and without loyalty, there can be no true patriotism.

"Patriotism, on the other hand, is love of country. It adds the emotional element of love and devotion to one's country, to loyalty and obedience to its laws. Patriotism without loyalty is hypocrisy."

The Marines, typified by such men as Sgt. John Basilone, in World War II, and such men as Maj. Gen. Oliver Smith, of Korean fame, in this war, always have had those definitions engraved on their hearts.

In 1951, let us hope that all Americans will need no prompting, when they're called upon to interpret these two often misused terms.

As a newspaperman who is part of show business, in a minute capacity, I'm hopeful that the people of show business will measure up to their obligations as citizens in 1951. Their duty is even greater, because no group is treated with greater affection and respect, and few groups are paid such huge salaries. Actually, only a tiny group of them are indifferent to their responsibilities.

In 1951, let's be sure that this small, dissident group gets in step with the Jimmy Durantes, the Irving Berlins, the Harvey Stones, the Dinah Shores, the Danny Kayes, the Jack Bennys, the Bing Crosbys, the Joe E. Browns, the Eddie Cantors, and the Bob Hopes who have added to the luster of the troupers.

Dulles' Plea for United Countering of Red Aggression

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following text of the address made by John Foster Dulles at the dinner of the American Association for the United Nations held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, taken from the New York Times of December 30, 1950:

TEXT OF DULLES' PLEA FOR UNITED COUNTERING OF RED AGGRESSION

WHERE ARE WE?

At the end of the year it is our good custom to pause to think about the past so that we can better plan the future. This year end it is particularly important to do that, and we should be grateful to all who, out of wisdom, experience, and proven idealism, help to clarify the grave issues that confront us.

As we look back we can feel satisfaction because of what our Nation has done. Great dangers still lie ahead, but that does not prove that the five postwar years have been years of failure and futility. There are usually patches of ground fog. But once we lift our vision so that we see the present in the light of historical perspective, it is apparent that the last 5 years have been years of great achievement and that our people have already surmounted great peril.

DANGER OF WESTERN DECADENCE

Nations are like people in the sense that while they may die a violent death they are more apt to die in their beds, particularly as they grow older. The great question of our time has been whether our western civilization had become so old and decadent that it was bound to pass away, giving place to the younger, dynamic, and barbarian society born out of the unholy union of Marx's communism and Russia's imperialism.

For 1,000 years our western civilization had been dominant in the world. It won and held that leadership on merit. It produced spiritual, intellectual, and material richness such as the world had never known before. The fruits of western society were spread everywhere, and men elsewhere wanted to share them, rather than to destroy their source.

However, a thousand years is a long time, even for a civilization, and many had come to feel that western civilization had run its course and had become infected with the same decay as had rotted other great civilizations of the past. The Communists in particular took that view, claiming that the west could no longer produce the vital leadership or creative acts needed to satisfy the material and political aspirations of the dissatisfied masses.

Taking advantage of Russia's defeat in World War I, the Bolshevik Communists seized the political power there, and from then on Russian state power and Bolshevik Party power worked hand in hand to expand their joint control.

The standard technique was not war, but rather intensive propaganda disparaging the west and promising to satisfy all the dissatisfied. Then, when the softening up had occurred, terrorism, subversion, and civil war were used to gain political control. By those methods the state and party steadily enlarged their political control until they had brought under it about 800,000,000 people, or one-third of all the people there are. And still they were rolling on toward their announced goal of a Soviet-designed one world.

Who was there to stop that movement? Many thought that it was unstoppable and a bandwagon trend was getting under way.

UNITED STATES RESPONSIBILITY

At this critical moment heavy responsibility fell upon the United States. We were still a relatively young nation; had not been devastated by war, and were on that account less susceptible than others to the poison that the Communist Party distills. We, if any, could perhaps demonstrate the faith and works needed to rally men to the cause of human freedom.

The whole world watched to see. If, at that juncture, we had sought only to save ourselves that would have been public confession that the Communists were right in the judgment that the west had rotted. The tide of communism would have rolled on irresistibly and we would have been encircled, isolated, and finally engulfed. Only as we sought to help others could we save ourselves.

Our people responded to that challenge by a 5-year record of which we can be proud.

Consider these deeds:

1. We showed, by example within our own country, that social justice could be had without traveling the Communist road of violent revolution and materialism. Through graduated income and estate taxes, and social security and pension plans, our capitalistic society has come to approach, more nearly than the Communist world, the ideal of production according to ability and distribution according to need.

2. Within 5 years the colonial system, which had become a festering sore, has been subjected to orderly liquidation. Over 750,000,000 people have peacefully won political independence. Great Britain, as the principal colonial power, took the lead. Our own direct national contribution has been the granting of freedom to the Philippines and the discrediting of racial discrimination here at home. But in many other ways we have exerted a powerful influence in this whole great process of building between men of different races, creeds, and colors a new relationship of partnership and of equality.

3. Since the end of World War II we have provided, in loans and grants, over $40,000,000,000 for the relief of other people and the reconstruction of other lands, thereby practicing the great commandment that the strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak.

4. We took the lead in founding the United Nations as an organization for recording the moral judgments of the world and developing ways to put power behind those judgments so as to promote collective justice and security. This year, for the first time in all the annals of history, a world organization moved with force to halt aggression and, whether or not that effort succeeds in Korea, the United Nations has revealed possibilities which will inspire further effort. Already, at this 1950 session, the United Nations General Assembly asked all the member nations to maintain armed forces which could serve as United Nations units and it adopted new procedures so that these contingents could be called into service without the paralysis of veto.

NEED FOR CONSTRUCTIVE CRITICISM

Now, I do not claim for a moment what our Nation has done in these respects has been perfectly done. Our own social changes may have gone so far as unduly to curtail incentive and self-reliance. In some cases, political independence may have been given to peoples who are so inexperienced in the ways of self-government that it will be hard for them to preserve that independence in the face of the diabolically clever apparatus of Soviet communism. Our loans and grants to others may sometimes have provided temporary relief rather than incentives to bold new creations of unity and strength.

Both the United States and the United Nations may have assumed political responsibilities which they did not yet have the power to back up. Policies, themselves good, often lacked efficient and timely execution. There have been grave and perhaps unnecessary setbacks. Almost surely the free world erred in relying too much on potential power, and in not creating enough military strength in being.

There is no occasion for complacency or for whitewash. There is need to expose errors and to point the way to making better use of all the moral and material assets that our people have shown they could provide. Such constructive pressures are needed and I have been among those who sought to create them. Under our political system that is a special responsibility of the opposition party.

But, surmounting whatever may have been the faults and inadequacies of leadership, the deeds of our people over the past 5 years emerge as a testimonial to greatness and to achievement.

THE COLD WAR THWARTED

A year ago, on January 1, 1950, Izvestia's leading editorial welcomed the new year with these words:

"Around the U. S. S. R. the camp of the fighters for peace, democracy, and socialism is growing and becoming stronger.

"The forces of this camp are multiplying day by day. The camp of democracy and socialism today includes the great Soviet Union, democratic Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Rumania, Hungary, Albania, Northern Korea, the Mongol People's Republic, the Chinese People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic."

And the editorial concluded:

"Communism is conquering, communism will triumph."

I do not know what Izvestia will say next Monday in greeting to 1951. I do know that, whereas between 1945 and 1950 it was boasting new conquests at the average rate of over two nations a year, there are, this year, no new names of which to boast. That means that the free world has found the way to slow down Soviet Communist expansion by methods short of open war. That is no mean accomplishment.

Communism pitted its youth against what it thought was our decrepitude; its universal creed against what it thought was our isolationism; its revolutionary practices against what it thought was our static mood. It found, to its dismay, a people who, when under pressure, did not decompose into factionalism and frustration. Unitedly, and with unpartisan and bipartisan leadership, they joined in an outpouring of compassion, fellowship, and material succor such as history has never before recorded.

There is scarcely a man, woman, or child in the United States who has not consciously made some sacrifice, out of the highest motives of which human beings are capable. In the process they have ennobled their own character, have given new hope and courage to millions elsewhere and have discomfited the leaders of Soviet communism.

That is not a performance to be belittled; nor is the mood one to be reversed.

We can rejoice in the renewal of the faith that has been the rock of our foundation and out of which have gushed healing waters. We can be confident that that faith, if sustained, assures our capacity to overcome at least one of the twin dangers which, at the end of World War II, confronted us. We are not doomed to die in our beds.

So much for the past. Let us look now to the future. Have we renewed our youth like the eagle's only to be shot at in battle? That might be. That was the risk our people took when they decided not to die from the internal diseases of old age.

The leaders of Soviet communism would have preferred sickness to be the method of our passing. They have great skill in spreading malignant germs and they prefer to practice that art rather than the art of open war where their nation may have quantitative superiority, but has qualitative inferiority. Party leaders have always distrusted the army and the generals, and are reluctant to give them the power that war exacts. If they have to use any army, they would rather use someone else's. Also, so long as they hold the Red Army in reserve to be only a threat, they can still get the advantage of their peace propaganda.

But since it seems that the free world has gained a certain immunity to the Communist Party poison, their leaders must now decide whether to accept one of those waiting periods which Stalin has taught may from time to time be necessary in order "to buy off a powerful enemy and gain a respite" or whether to resort increasingly to open war.

The fact that the free world succeeded, to the degree it did, in slowing up Communist success by methods short of war, automatically increased the risk of war itself.

But risk is not the same as certainty. Just as we surmounted, in recent years, the primary peril of inner decay, so, in the year ahead, we must seek to surmount also the peril of full-scale foreign war. Our search must be for effective deterrents to Russian armed aggression.

The free world starts out with certain assets which, I think we would all agree, are capable of being developed into deterrents of a general war of Russian origin. Since moral factors do not weigh heavily in the Russian scale, we are forced to think somewhat in material terms.

OUR INDUSTRIAL SUPERIORITY

Our inventive, resourceful, and free society has given industrial productivity far greater than that of Russia. In terms of steel, aluminum, electric power and oil, the United States has a superiority of 3 or 4 to 1 over Russia. That ratio of superiority would not, of course, hold if Russia could take the industrial power of the Ruhr and Western Europe and the oil of the Middle East.

So long as there are impediments to that, the free world has an economic power which operates as a major deterrent to open Russian aggression, particularly if we also have the will to forego some of our pleasures and put our economic machine into creating weapons on a mass production basis.

RUSSIAN INTERNAL VULNERABILITY

Already, within the captive world, there are grave internal weaknesses and these could be exploited by skillful opponents. Despotism, when looked at from without usually looks solid and formidable, whereas free societies look divided and weak. Actually, that is an optical illusion. The reality is just the opposite.

Take Russia. Out of its 200,000,000 people, only about 6,000,000, or 3 percent, are members of the ruling Communist Party. The political prisoners number from 10,000,000 to 15,000,000, or twice the total membership of the party. The party itself is shot through with distrust and suspicion and there are periodic purges as between party factions. No one, even in high authority, feels personally safe.

In the case of the satellite countries, the situation is even more precarious. For example, there is much unrest on the China mainland, and in Poland and Czechoslovakia the people are forced to accept officials of Russian nationality because no trustworthy persons can be found at home.

When a few men rule despotically 800,000,000, that is bound to be a vulnerable position. Many of the 800,000,000 are sure to be sullen, resentful, and eager for change. Most of the others will have been so beaten into submissiveness by the harsh discipline of the police state, that they have lost all sense of personal responsibility and could not respond to the needs which war disruptions would impose.

War can be very unkind to rulers who are despots and who have systematically destroyed the individual initiatives of their people. They know that and we can increasingly help them to see the light.

FALLACY OF AREA DEFENSE

When it comes to straight military strategy, the free world seems, momentarily, in a mood of some confusion and without any agreed deterrent program.

The Soviet Union has interior lines. It has concentrated men, tanks, artillery and strategic and tactical planes around the hub of the great circle of its control. The rim starts near the North Pole, swings south along the border of Norway, Finland, Sweden, West Germany, Austria and Yugoslavia; then east along the border of Greece, Turkey, the Arab States, Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan, India, Burma, Indochina, and Malaya; then northward close to the Philippines, Formosa, Japan, Korea, and Alaska. From within this vast orbit, a single will can, in secrecy, plot and act to strike any one of many nations with overwhelming force.

It may be possible, by prearranged defense, to make that attack costly, particularly where sea and air power play a role or where, as in Western Europe, there are depth and numbers and military experience on which to draw. But it is not practicable to build up in each one of the more than 20 nations making up this vast frontier of about 20,000 miles, static defensive forces which could make each nation impregnable to a major and unpredictable assault by the Red armies of Russia. To attempt this would be to have strength nowhere and bankruptcy everywhere.

That, however, does not mean that we should abandon the whole idea of collective security and build our own defense area with the help of such other countries as we might pick because of their capacity to be useful to us.

There are, I think, flaws in that thesis. Any nation which at a moment of supreme danger sheds those of its allies who are most endangered, and to whom it is bound by solemn treaty, by common heritage and by fellowship in war and peace, is scarcely in a position thereafter to do much picking and choosing for its own account. It elects a dangerous course, for solitary defense is never impregnable.

It is possible to plan, on paper, and describe in words, what it seems should be an impregnable defense, a China Wall, a Maginot Line, a Rock of Gibraltar, an Atlantic and Pacific moat. But the mood that plans such a defense carries within itself the seeds of its own collapse. A defense that accepts encirclement quickly decomposes. That has been proved a thousand times.

A United States which could be an inactive spectator while the barbarians overran and desecrated the cradle of our Christian civilization would not be the kind of a United States which could defend itself.

DETERRENT TO RETALIATORY POWER

Fortunately, we do not have to choose between two disastrous alternatives. It is not necessary either to spread our strength all around the world in futile attempts to create everywhere a static defense, nor need we crawl back into our own hole in the vain hope of defending ourselves against all the rest of the world. We are not bankrupt in resourcefulness.

Around the rim of the captive world the free world can create enough economic and political vigor, enough military strength and enough will to resist so that these areas cannot be cheaply conquered by subversive methods, by trumped-up civil wars or even by satellite attacks.

If the Soviet Union itself decides on open aggressive war, there is only one effective defense, for us and for others. That is the capacity to counterattack. That is the ultimate deterrent.

When I was in the Senate, working for the ratification of the North Atlantic Pact, I took the position that it did not commit the United States to the land defense of any particular area; it did not commit us to action, but action of our own choosing rather than action that an aggressor could dictate to us.

In Korea, the United Nations forces suffer the grave handicap of trying to repel an aggressor within the limited area he selected for an attack, at the time he selected, and with methods of war which are dictated by the terrain and the weather he selected.

Our people have loyally, sacrificially, and rightly backed this historic first attempt at organized suppression of aggression. We have done so despite the fact that this effort involves the inevitable defects of any first endeavor. But we instinctively feel that there is something wrong about the methods and do not want to be committed to a series of Koreas all around the globe.

That instinct is quite sound.

Against such military power as the Soviet Union can marshal, collective security depends on capacity to counterattack against the aggressor. Then the force that protects one protects all, and there is a good chance of deterring aggression.

The United States is not without power in this respect. We have our strategic air force, a stock of weapons, naval power, and potential strength on the ground. Much more of all of this needs now to be brought into being.

Total reliance should not be placed on any single form of warfare or any relatively untried type of weapon. The arsenal of retaliation should include all forms of counterattack with maximum flexibility, mobility, and the possibility of surprise. The places of assembly should be chosen, not as places to defend, but as places suitable for launching the means of destroying the forces of aggression, if aggression occurs.

The United Nations, if it shows that it has the requisite moral courage, should be given the right to determine the fact of aggression so as to insure the Charter goal of armed forces not being used save in the common interest.

In such ways the idea of collective security can be given sensible and effective content.

We cannot be sure that anything we now do will, in fact, prevent the awful catastrophe of a third world war. The final decision will be made in the Kremlin. Perhaps it has been made already. That we cannot know. We face a period that is bound to be one of grave anxiety. But so long as the die has not been irrevocably cast for war, we must assume that righteous peace may yet be possible; and we must work with all the power that lies within us to achieve that peace.

It is not pleasant, at this holiday season, to talk about instruments of death. But events in Korea have shown that peace is not to be found in an unbalance of military power. To correct that balance is a grim necessity. But it is a necessity which also requires that we be vigilant to preserve and not relax the moral safeguards with which military power needs always to be surrounded.

We can rejoice that the United Nations forces in Asia and the North Atlantic forces in Europe are under the command of two men, General MacArthur and General Eisenhower, who have demonstrated, in peace and war, that they put material values second and moral values first. That should be the mood of all people.

It is not easy to do what has to be done without whipping up emotions which are provocative of war. Now, if ever, is the time when our people should preserve the calm resolve which, in moments of peril, is the hallmark of true greatness.

Railway Labor Bill, H. R. 7789

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, circumstances required my absence from Washington on Monday, January 1, 1951. Should H. R. 7789, a bill to amend the Railway Labor Act, come before the House for action, I desire to be recorded in favor of the legislation. If I were present, I would vote for it.

It is possible that a similar Senate bill may be substituted for the above-mentioned bill. If so, I would vote for it.

Malone Warns Against the Gray Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "MALONE Warns Against the Gray Report," published in the Mineral County (Nev.) Independent-News of December 13, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MALONE WARNS AGAINST THE GRAY REPORT

United States Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, Republican, of Nevada, warned today of what he considers the grave danger to the national economy and of the unbearable tax burden which would be put upon the shoulders of the American people if the so-called Gray report should be approved by Congress.

The Nevada Senator, in a statement issued by his Washington office, said that some of the recommendations made by Gordon Gray, Special Assistant to the President, in his Report to the President on Foreign Economic Policy, paralleled some of his own recommendations but that the Gray report went entirely too far and embodied all the crackpot program of the Socialist-minded State Department.

Senator MALONE suggested that the American people, particularly their representatives in Congress, read the fine print before making up their minds about the Gray report. Senator MALONE, in urging that utmost caution be exercised, called attention to the fact that approval of the report would provide:

1. That we continue sending money to so-called Marshall plan countries for 3 or 4 years after the expiration of ECA without requiring those countries to stop arming Russia.

2. That our net outflow of capital to underdeveloped areas of the world be in the range of $600,000,000 each year, this additional money to be taken, of course, from the American taxpayers.

3. That means be found to actually increase the high volume of slave-labor exports from foreign countries to the United States to compete with American-made goods produced by American workers with a higher wage standard, this leading inevitably to the lowering of the American worker's standard of living.

4. That the American Government protect British pound sterling and the external position of the United Kingdom. (Isn't it about time our administration started thinking about protecting the American dollar and the American economy?)

5. That the American taxpayers be called upon to guarantee private investments in foreign countries against the risks of nonconvertibility and expropriation (and this, mind you, without calling upon those countries for any guaranties).

6. That America extend the point-4 program, the foot-in-the-door never-ending foreign give-away which could conceivably involve the American taxpayers to the extent of billions and even trillions of dollars.

7. That the United States become a member of the International Trade Organization, whereby the domestic and foreign trade of the United States could be governed by fifty-odd countries, the United States having just one vote.

Senator MALONE concluded: "These and other factors of the Gray recommendations are but a repetition of the same old State Department ideas which the American people have recently repudiated at the polls, to the extent of defeating the administration leaders in the Senate and the others who made excuses for the State Department. I do not know whom the administration thinks it is kidding by trotting out this discrediting program. The economic ruin of the United States is Stalin's aim, and with the apparent help of the Democratic administration, progress is being made toward Stalin's goal."

Pulling Together

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include therein an editorial from the Birmingham Eccentric, Birmingham, Mich., one of the outstanding newspapers of the congressional district which I have the honor to represent.

The good sense and sound reasoning contained in this editorial is worthy of reading and consideration by every Member of Congress. I commend it to my colleagues. The editorial follows:

[From the Birmingham Eccentric of December 21, 1950]

LET US PULL TOGETHER—AS FREE MEN

Now that the United States Government has declared this Nation to be living in a state of emergency, the voices of many are raised in that old and familiar chorus: "Let us put aside our personal and political differences, and all pull together."

To be sure, in the all-out effort to produce the munitions of defense, the chorus makes sense.

But to expect the American people to follow, without any convictions of their own to be expressed, the leadership of any segment of the general government is merely to submit to a form of voluntary totalitarianism.

We don't expect free Americans ever to do that.

Specifically, we raise the question: What about Secretary of State Dean Acheson? Since he has lost the confidence of a majority of the American people—including Democrats as well as Republicans—are we going to shut up and accept him as perfection merely because the President of the United States wants us to?

The President is an elected official, for a certain term of years. Being human, he will make mistakes, but short of impeachment proceedings, he must live out his term. A Secretary of State is an appointed official, who can be removed at any time by the man who appointed him—the President himself.

Certainly the President knows how much of a debit upon the balance sheet of his administration Mr. Acheson is. Only the President's blind stubbornness keeps Acheson on the job.

And as long as he is on the job, this Nation will not have complete confidence in the motives and acts of Harry S. Truman.

As we plunge into the current tension, more mistakes are bound to be made. Some of them will be excusable, some of them will not.

But more of them will be forgiven if Truman has at his side men and women who are not under public suspicion and dislike—and Acheson, the striped-pants diplomatic intellectual whose handling of Asiatic problems has done much to create our present world mess, will continue to be a tremendous brake on the upsurge of morale of America.

Personally, we do not dislike or hate Mr. Acheson. Were he our neighbor, we'd get a kick out of lending him our lawnmower, or gabbing over the back fence * * * but, by all the gods ever conjured up by the minds of men, we don't believe him presently fit to hold his office, and join millions of other Americans who want him to get off his job.

As we said in the beginning of this comment, the times do call for the need of Americans to pull together.

This we intend to do in every phase of the business of building up a common defense of the weapons of war.

But to expect loyal Americans, whether they be mere citizens or public officials, to abdicate from the protective processes of the free government we are fighting to defend * * * well, that type of elemental existence is reserved only for totalitarian peoples.

The darkest hour ever faced by a free people ought to, somehow, elevate their leaders to heroic and inspired examples of greatness.

To this end we raise our voice in pleading prayer that Almighty God will, in some manner, enter into the head and heart of Harry S. Truman, and make him a figure that will become beloved by future generations of human beings—not only in the United States, but in every land where freedom hungers to live and thrive.

We pray thus not merely to glorify one man, but rather to have that one man rise to the supreme heights of man's earthly estate, thus exemplifying the greatness of our people * * * to the glory of free men "* * * made in the image and likeness of God."

Penetration Program Against Communism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALEXANDER WILEY
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, last Friday I issued a public statement on ways and means of penetrating the Soviet Union in order to create internal dissension there and in the satellite nations. This is an idea which others and I have long recommended, and I am glad to see that at long last it has caught on.

I am particularly gratified by the outstanding response which my latest statement has elicited. So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the text of my release on this issue, to be followed by certain comments which I have received from Wisconsin. I should like to include a telegram received from one of the most courageous editors in Wisconsin who focused his sights on the Communist menace long before the American public generally awakened to the danger of this threat. I refer to Mr. John Chapple, managing editor of the Ashland Daily Press, Ashland, Wis.

Along this same line, there was printed in the November 1950 issue of the Reader's Digest an article entitled "We Can Win the Cold War in Russia." This article was written by Constantine W. Boldyreff, professor of Russian in the School of Foreign Service at Georgetown University, Washington, D. C., in conjunction with Mr. O. K. ARMSTRONG, newly elected Member of Congress. I ask unanimous consent that the text of that article, too, be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, following my release.

There being no objection, the statement and accompanying papers were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILEY URGES ALL-OUT, WORLD-WIDE PENETRATION PROGRAM AGAINST COMMUNISM—SUGGESTS REVOLUTIONARY STRATEGY BOARD

I have been urging for years that America must give Russia and her satellites a taste of their own vile medicine. For years they have been attempting to foment revolutions within the free western nations. They have shipped arms, money, sabotage materials, etc., to their cohorts in our free lands.

COMMANDO TACTICS NECESSARY

The time is overdue for us to stop following a mere "pantywaist" diplomacy—a mere wordy Voice of America program. We must start using a commando-type program of psychological and revolutionary penetration, including the use of "silver bullets"—money.

I believe that if we follow such a bold program, if we cause the Russians and their satellites as much or more real trouble in their territory as they have caused in ours, we will have staved off to a considerable extent the threat of a third world war. In other words, the more preoccupied the Russians are with their own internal difficulties and disturbances the less they will feel they could rely upon their own and satellite peoples; and to that extent war pressure would be eased. I am recommending this program, therefore, not as a war effort but as a peace effort.

The hundreds of millions of dollars that we would spend to ship arms, sabotage equipment, etc., is but a drop in the bucket compared with the cost of a fleet of modern-day battleships or a fleet of long-range bombers.

RUSSIANS VULNERABLE TO PENETRATION

There are several reasons for such a world-wide revolutionary program:

1. The basic reason is, of course, that the Russians are infinitely more susceptible to this type of troublemaking on our part than we are to troublemaking on their part:

Most experts believe that during World War II Hitler could have won over to his cause millions of Russians, had his army not followed a program of brutal extermination. In the Ukraine, the German armies were initially greeted with open arms as friends and not as conquerors, but Hitler's policies soon changed that.

Red China is especially vulnerable to agitating of dissension, because there are reported to be over a million guerrillas already in combat there. Russia itself with vast land mass and borders and its 70 nationalities, offers a tremendous opportunity for us. There is scarcely a family in Russia that hasn't had a member or relative liquidated or forced into slave labor. This fact provides fertile ground for our liberal distribution of arms for vengeance.

IT TAKES ARMS TO COMBAT DICTATORSHIP

2. It is a fact that you cannot revolt against a modern type of armed dictator unless you do have arms. The time has come for us to proclaim, "workers of the world, unite; we will give you the arms to break your chains."

3. A third basic reason for this program is that it will be in full accordance with the principles of ideological warfare we are now waging. If we seriously believe in the principles of freedom that we espouse, then it is up to us to help others actually gain that freedom. America would never have originally gained her freedom, had it not been for the splendid material aid of French patriots, rather than mere moral encouragement.

There are those who may be squeamish and who will say that this program which I am recommending and which others have recommended would merely provoke the Russians. On the contrary, I say that there is nothing that will provoke Russia more than our own weakness, our pussyfooting, and our stupidity.

WE NEED A DEMOCRACY INTERNATIONAL WITH STRATEGY BOARD

It is up to us to set up our own type of organization equivalent to the Comintern—the Communist International—which will preach not mere words, but which will give guns to fulfill those words, as necessary. Hand grenades talk louder than hand applause. We dare not lose an additional day. Let us secure the appointment of a commando-type leader with audacity and imagination, to carry out this program. And let there be appointed a board of revolutionary strategy consisting of the ablest experts in military science (particularly guerrilla warfare), experts in ethnic groups, etc., to plan our tactics, logistics, etc. Let this group work with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the State Department on the highest policy level.

From Madison, Wis.:

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: We are 100 percent behind your idea of sponsored uprisings in Communist countries."

From Sparta, Wis.:

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: I am heartily in accord with your expressed idea of giving the Communists a taste of their own vile medicine. We should play their own game and beat them at it. General Chennault's views re assistance and support to guerrilla activities in China apparently are similar to yours, and friends with whom I have spoken believe firmly in accelerating activities to support guerrilla and underground efforts to overthrow the Communists wherever they operate.

"I wish you much success in your legislative efforts."

From West Bend, Wis.:

"DEAR SENATOR WILEY: Yours is the first sensible aggressive suggestion to come forward in the search for a method of fighting communism. It would effectively nullify the Russian plan of using satellite armies to destroy our forces while conserving the Russian military machine. I hope you keep up this fight to develop an aggressive American foreign policy."

ASHLAND, WIS., December 29, 1950.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building:

Congratulations on your proposal to strike directly at the criminal conspirators in control of Soviet Russia by assisting the people of Russia in the revolutionary overthrow of their present government. This would bring Russia back into the family of nations and give the peoples of the world an opportunity for lasting peace. It is the most logical proposal yet made to meet and conquer Russia's unwavering 33-year-old campaign to create world revolution and blot out freedom and hope for humanity. The present leaders of Russia betrayed the revolution against the Czar and are criminal usurpers of the Russian peoples dream of a government similar to America's. Your proposal if its gets through the iron curtain will bring the greatest surge of hope in the hearts of the Russian people of anything during this generation.

Respectfully,

JOHN B. CHAPPLE,
Managing Editor, Ashland Daily Press.

[From the Reader's Digest of November 1950]

WE CAN WIN THE COLD WAR IN RUSSIA

(By Constantine W. Boldyreff with O. K. ARMSTRONG)

Despite the war in Korea and the certainty that the tyrants who rule the Soviet Union have a blueprint for further aggression, I believe that a major conflict with Russia is not inevitable.

World war III can be prevented by an immediate and vigorous psychological attack aimed at the enemy's weakest spot—smoldering opposition of the Russian people against their oppressors in the Kremlin. Despite two generations of indoctrination, despite the relentless efforts of the dread secret police to crush all hope of freedom, there is bitter resentment against Stalin's slave regime. If that latent opposition can be aroused and organized, Stalin and his fellow conspirators will not dare provoke war. Once the opposition in Russia gets rolling, it can never be stopped.

I write as one who has lived a life of active opposition to the Bolshevik regime. After World War I my father, Lt. Gen. Vassily Boldyreff, commanded the White Russian Army in Siberia resisting the Bolsheviks. I was then a cadet. My father was captured and liquidated. In 1930 I helped to organize the NTS (National Alliance of Russian Solidarists), an underground organization secretly working in Russia today toward the revolution we know must someday free our people.

We who have chosen freedom must warn that the democracies are fast losing the cold war. Many well-meaning people presume, as did Trygve Lie, secretary-general of the United Nations, that if leaders of both sides will sit down together their differences can be settled by discussion and compromise. That is not true. Marxist communism is a militant, proselyting doctrine, based upon struggle. It carries inspiring promises, it creates zealots. But it cannot permit liberty of thought or action, it cannot tolerate opposition. Therefore it can never be appeased. It must be defeated.

Our need is to understand the enemy's plan of campaign. Stalin wants war—but not for Russia now. He wants war to strengthen his position internally and bleed the United States white. Here in Stalin's own words is the fundamental principle for Communist strategy of world conquest: "War leads to the weakening of the positions of capitalism in general. It approximates in its effect a proletarian revolution."

So Stalin has devised the diabolically shrewd plan to set the world afire with wars, fought by his puppets under Soviet-trained leaders, while keeping Russia officially neutral. By this means Stalin can enjoy all the privileges accorded honest diplomacy while his stooges stand in the United Nations and damn peace-loving peoples in barrages of propaganda aimed to win the underprivileged millions of the earth.

That was the pattern in Korea. It will be the pattern in Formosa, where Stalin hopes to draw the United States into war with China. It will be the pattern in Germany, where American guns may blaze away not at Russians but at Soviet-supported Germans.

Stalin does not fear the feverish arming of the United States, the diversion of manpower from normal production, the use of resources, and the vast expenditures for implements of war. That fits his plan of bleeding the United States white. But one thing he does fear—a revolt of the Russian people.

The masters of the Kremlin dread most a movement that will show their victims how to shake off Communist control. The Achilles' heel of Soviet rule has always been in Russia. Between 1921 and 1941 there were more than 30 revolts, rebellions, and active plots against the Bolshevik regime. Most of these, spontaneous and disorganized, were doomed from the start. But they indicated unmistakably the hatred of the people for their oppressors.

When Hitler's armies invaded Russia in 1941 the people greeted them as liberators. In less than 5 months millions of Russians surrendered to the Germans. By 1942 an organized anti-Bolshevik revolution under the leadership of Gen. Andrei Vlassov was on its way. But Nazi atrocities were more than even desperate anti-Communists could stomach, and the powerful force of Russian patriotism switched from combating the regime to defending the homeland. After the war hundreds of thousands of Russian prisoners of war and displaced persons refused to return to the Soviet Union.

Today the people of Russia hate the Communist regime more than ever before. Victory in World War II brought no relief for them. Instead, life became more difficult. Authentic reports from the underground indicate the fury and intensity of recent selective purges, comparable in their violence to the bloody carnage organized in 1937–38. There are about 15,000,000 prisoners in concentration camps; hardly a Russian family but has lost at least one member as a victim to Bolshevik cruelty. No one, not even party members and public officials, is free from the haunting fear of arrest.

The people of the democracies need quickly to enlist these allies in the only campaign that spells sure defeat for communism—the war of ideas. These are the weapons we can equip them with:

1. Active and open encouragement.

Neither the size nor the significance of the Russians' opposition to communism has been understood by the free nations. Escapees from the Soviet Union are forced to live wretched, hunted lives in Western Europe, Greece, and Turkey. The democracies have failed signally to encourage and to help these refugees. Yet they are passionate partisans of freedom—our best allies. Most of them have staked their lives to escape communism and will stake them again to destroy communism and liberate their enslaved people.

Assurance should be given the anti-Communist forces within Russia that by every means their hands will be strengthened. Announcement of a plan of assistance for all working in the underground would fire these patriots with hope and determination.

It cannot be urged too strongly that Russians be equipped and encouraged to conduct their own psychological war. The weakness of the Voice of America is that it sends propaganda from America. Its effectiveness would be immeasurably multiplied if its broadcasts were by, of, and for Russians.

Criticism by a foreigner can be misunderstood and resented by the sensitive national. Verbal attacks upon the Red army are harmful because it is Russian, not Bolshevik. The people are proud of its victories. Unfavorable comparisons of standards of living can be misinterpreted as boastful superiority. It should be made clear that the people are being robbed of their birthrights of freedom and truth, but comparisons must be made in the spirit of kindness, sympathy, and understanding.

2. A campaign of truth.

The people of the Soviet Union are famished for authentic news and ideas from the outside world. Russian leaders of liberation should be equipped immediately to speak loudly and clearly to the masses over the heads of their dictators. They must use every occasion to assert:

That credit for Russia's war record belongs to its people, not to Stalin and his gang.

That the Western World does not blame the Russian people for the Kremlin's peace-wrecking tactics.

That all free people share the aspirations of the Russian people for freedom and are eager to help them earn it.

That Soviet propaganda which brands the United States and its associates as aggressors bent on Russia's destruction is fantastically false.

That, above all, the free peoples seek the friendship of the Russian people, and once the Communist menace has been conquered this friendship can be established on a lasting basis.

How can we get this message across in a major psychological offensive? First method is the radio. Let the Voice of America be augmented by the Voice of Free Russia, with a ring of radio stations all around the U. S. S. R.

Second method is the use of leaflets, newspapers and other publications, printed both inside and outside of the homeland. Those from the outside can be sent in by aircraft and balloons. No government could do this in time of peace, but private agencies can. Mystery planes, sowing the truth, can invade the Soviet skies. Hundreds of patriotic fliers are ready to risk their necks in this service.

Printed items, particularly those that give news of and encouragement to the opposition, have a tremendous impact upon the minds of the Russian people. The fact that they are forbidden to read counter-propaganda makes it all the more sought after. Try as they may, the secret police cannot grab all the leaflets or arrest all who possess them. Moreover, nations denied freedom of press and speech become huge whispering galleries, through which suppressed facts and ideas quickly spread. We know that, within hours after the Voice of America announced Mrs. Kasenkina's jump from a Soviet consulate window in New York, all Moscow was buzzing with the story.

3. A program of action.

Psychological warfare is effective only when it calls for constructive effort. Foremost in our campaign should be a plan to strengthen all elements of opposition both in the satellite nations and within Russia itself. Workers in the underground require the kind of external help only free peoples can give them: money, equipment, moral support.

Thousands of recruits are available for infiltration into Russia. Underground agents should be prepared to select and urge members to penetrate into key positions in the Communist Party. They should establish close contact with those already in such positions and give them the ideological ammunition they need.

Activities that bring the anti-Communist opposition to public attention should be greatly multiplied. A new form of underground organization least vulnerable to the secret police has been developed: Unknown to each other, single fighters, inspired and instructed by leaflets, act individually but uniformly in the effort to attain common aims. They signalize their existence to other anonymous fighters by painting the NTS symbol—a trident—on walls and sidewalks, perhaps with an appropriate slogan. With the mounting confidence sure to follow such a full-scale psychological offensive, the tide of results will rise.

One basic aim of our campaign is to overcome the Russians' fear of the MVD, the secret police. By ruthlessness and cruelty, the Politburo has nurtured the idea that its agents are invincible and invulnerable. Our task is to prove that a myth. Already we have shown that, like the Nazi Gestapo, it can be duped and misled.

Nicolas Sinevirsky, an NTS member, joined the military branch of MVD for several months and returned to this side of the iron curtain. A book about his experiences was published by Possev, the Russian anti-Communist newspaper of Western Germany. This paper is receiving clandestine circulation in Russia and the satellite countries, with devastating effect upon MVD morale. By incessant repetition, by overt acts, the vulnerability of the MVD must become an accepted fact in Russia.

The men of the Kremlin know that once their grip loosens at home their stooges in the satellite nations will also lose their power. And with that loss there can be no more wars fought by Communist-dominated masses. Then the revolt will gather strength and sweep the Russian homeland.

Here is a task to which the best efforts of free nations can be dedicated. The support of their governments is necessary. But the movement toward freedom has always come from the people. Churches of all faiths, labor organizations, educational and civic groups, all can help to equip our liberation forces with the weapons of truth and action. Victory in the psychological war will mean peace. Its loss could mean that all that has been gained in human rights from the Magna Carta to the American Constitution will go down into chaos and enslavement.

Hunters' Corps

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I am going to continue my fight in the interest of national defense by strengthening our home front, agitating for a hunters' corps.

Last week, I presented an amendment to the civil defense bill, which provided a volunteer army of hunters and sportsmen in every community in the United States.

I was prompted to do this by my conviction that hunters in my district at least are patriotic Americans and expert shots and woodsmen. They would make the best of guerrilla fighters in case of invasion.

I received many letters of praise from all over the country and I am taking the liberty of having a typical one submitted with these remarks, which shows the enthusiastic reaction which the Hall amendment received with the public:

HON. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HALL: We received the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read your speech. It was very good—all of it. Any person that would vote against what you said must be a Communist or sympathetic with them.

It is as you say, sportsmen are good Americans, whether it be small game hunters or fox and deer hunters. They are out-of-door men, used to all kinds of weather, and are good shots, and they know the country in many different localities. In this country 35 or 40 such men equipped with ammunition and guns, and properly ambushed could make it mighty hot for invading land troops. I know of men in this surrounding locality with their own Winchester rifles 30/06, equipped with telescope sights, could kill an enemy one-half mile away nearly every time he shot. Many of these hunters already have rifles so equipped, just the thing for sharpshooters.

We found many interesting things in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD you sent, and thank you.

Sincerely,

ARTHUR CRANE.

DEPOSIT, N. Y., December 27, 1950.

The Forgotten Army in Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WALTER H. JUDD

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include an editorial from the Washington Daily News and a second article blasting the pro-Communist propaganda so skillfully propagated in our country since 1944 that Chinese forces did not or would not fight. How long are American boys to be killed needlessly in Korea because our Government refuses to accept help from those who have fought Chinese Communists longest and know them best?

[From the Washington Daily News of January 2, 1951]

THE FORGOTTEN ARMY

Until the Chinese Reds invaded Korea last October some Americans had been led to believe that Chinese soldiers wouldn't fight.

They know better now.

But what many Americans still may not know is that Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist armies also fought well when they had something to fight with.

That part of the story is told by Clyde Farnsworth, veteran far-eastern war correspondent, in the adjacent columns. It is a story by a man who was there.

Americans are fighting Asiatic Communists in Asia while anti-Communist Asiatic troops are being held out of the fight on orders from President Truman. Read that again, because it doesn't seem to make sense. And it doesn't make sense.

Mr. Farnsworth doesn't go into the politics involved in this situation. But he does present abundant evidence that by and large the Chinese Nationalists were first-class fighting men.

There are 400,000 to 500,000 of these veteran troops in Formosa now. Early in the Korean war Chiang Kai-shek offered 33,000 of his troops to the United Nations, and more if they were wanted. His offer was not accepted, because the United States and Britain did not want to offend the Chinese Communists.

Now that the Chinese Communists are fighting the United Nations forces anyway, that objection would seem to have lost its force. But the Chinese Nationalists still haven't been permitted to join in the fight. Why? This newspaper cannot answer that. Perhaps President Truman and the British Foreign Office can.

Many people would like to know.

NATIONALISTS HAVE WILL AND CAPACITY TO FIGHT

(By Clyde Farnsworth)

(NOTE.—This is the second of three articles by Clyde Farnsworth answering the question raised in some quarters as to whether the Chinese Nationalists can and will fight. Mr. Farnsworth returned to this country recently from an 8-year tour of duty in the Orient.)

It was never easy for foreign correspondents in China to see actual fighting in the many wars that have beset that country.

But that is not because there was no fighting. It was often savage and prolonged. But distances, lack of transportation, and Chinese reluctance to accept responsibility for foreigners' safety have combined to make front-line reporting difficult.

In my 8 years in China I have seen the Nationalist armies of Chiang Kai-shek not only in battle but overwhelming evidence of their achievements against both the Chinese Communists and the Japanese.

In May 1944, at the very height of a wave of American criticism of the Nationalist command's will and capacity to oppose the Japanese, I saw the jump-off of a Chinese expeditionary force across the Salween River into the Japanese-held Burma border region of southwest China.

This was a brave but ill-equipped offensive by 20,000 troops on a 100-mile river front into the Kaolikung Mountains, a branch of the Himalayas. The Nationalists battled rain, fog, sleet—and Japanese—sometimes above 10,000 feet, an altitude at which airline passengers have to go on oxygen.

These Chinese troops had worked out coolie methods of carrying dismantled 75-millimeter howitzers. They lugged the guns themselves when the going got too tough for pack animals.

I saw their siege of Tengchung, which went on for 2 months until the Japanese defenders were killed to the last man.

Day after day Chinese storm troops tunneled and trenched their way against Tengchung's massive walls and repeatedly made frontal attacks, trying to prop their bamboo ladders in machine-gun crossfire.

I saw the pools of blood on the paddy-field pathways leading from the siege to nearby villages that were packed with wounded and dying men.

In 1945, from the pickaback seat of a P-40 on a fire-bombing and strafing mission of the Chinese-American Composite Wing, I saw the stubborn resurgence of Chinese troops in the defense of Chihkiang, eastern Hunan Province.

This was the enemy's last China offensive and one of the greatest victories of the Chinese Nationalists.

Inquiring the other day in the historical section of the Defense Department where an American official history of World War II is in preparation, with the China-Burma-India volumes still to come, I was told by one of the historians:

"We don't know what the Chinese armies did anywhere in China except on the Salween front where Gen. Joe Stilwell's Y-force (an advisory group) was working directly with the Chinese expeditionary force. American officers were discouraged—you might say not even permitted to go to the fronts in China.

"All we have on the Chinese effort against Japan was what the Chinese told Stilwell's headquarters they were doing and what Stilwell's headquarters thought they were doing."

The fact is, however, that there were American air-ground liaison teams on every active front in China after the American entrance into the war.

The division of opinion in the high command in the United States and a corresponding division of American effort in China had a profound effect on China's war effort.

Out of General Stilwell's preoccupation with the Burma Road and his burning desire to unite and command both Chinese Nationalist and Communist forces stemmed most of the case against Chiang Kai-shek and his generals. The air-ground liaison teams had a different story to tell.

Seven years ago this month I walked into the almost total devastation of the city of Changteh, in Hunan Province, and found that an air-ground liaison team had played a great part in a battle that had passed from Japanese attack, to siege, to retreat—while United States 14th Air Force planes served the Chinese as flying artillery.

A power drive by 100,000 Japanese troops had been broken and turned back, a Chinese division had been virtually wiped out, and three Chinese divisional commanders killed in action.

Correspondents from Chungking, who approached Changteh doubting that there was a war on, were shown the Hiroshima-like destruction of a large and once-prosperous city and mass graves.

They were shown these things by Chinese Nationalists in an area that had received no American aid except air support.

Two or three days later, on the morning of December 24, 1943, the whole group of Chungking correspondents and a few foreign military attachés from Chungking were nearly killed when Japanese fighter-bombers attacked a school building in Taoyuan on the same front.

Near misses shook the building where they had been lodged overnight and where the victorious Chinese had stored tons of captured Japanese arms and ammunition.

In the spring of 1948 I spent 2 weeks with the Fifth Chinese Army on the move through Honan Province in pursuit of Red Gen. Liu Po-cheng and his elusive guerrillas.

At the end of the visit, Gen. Chiu Chingchuan promised to invite me back for a real battle when that seemed probable. I was in Japan when he finally wrote. The general died with his men in a ring of Communist gunfire that caught three armies south of Hsuchow 2 years ago this month.

For an outfit with no fight in it the Nationalist army has had an unprecedented number of generals killed in action or by their own hand in the disgrace of defeat: a farewell note to the Generalissimo, then a pistol at the temple or a grenade.

I saw Red siege rings tighten about Changchun and Mukden in the Communist victory that turned industrial Manchuria into a base for conquest of China proper.

And Taiyuan, in Shansi Province, where a million soldiers and civilians survived and fought for many months on airlifted food until Communist ack-ack cut their aerial artery.

I saw, from the air, Shihchiachuang turned into a smoking battlefield and one of the first pivots of Nationalist disaster in North China.

I saw planes dropping down at Shanghai with cargoes of wounded from the Battle of Hsuchow. But they made scarcely a dent in the 20,000 wounded who had to be abandoned there when the Reds, with superior fire power, superior strategy and tactics, and, for the first major instance, superior numbers, broke the Hsuchow line.

Months later I saw the sandy grave mounds of Kinmen (Quemoy) Island where Nationalist trops, backboned by units fresh from retraining on Formosa under Gen. Sun Li-jen, wiped out a 20,000-man amphibious attack from the nearby mainland.

I saw enough to know that the Chinese Nationalists fought both the Japanese and the Chinese Communists. And that the loss of the China mainland was the result of a tremendous passage at arms and was not, as some of our Government officials have said, a victory by Nationalist default.

Our Commander in Chief

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS J. LANE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include the following excellent article that appeared in the Lynn Telegram News, of Lynn, Mass., on Sunday, December 24, 1950, by Mr. Clem Norton, a writer with many years of practical experience.

Mr. Norton served the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for a long period of time as superintendent of the State pier, Boston, Mass., with an enviable record of accomplishments. As a member of the school committee he served many terms in the city of Boston. He did much to improve the school system of that metropolitan city and through his arduous work on that board the school children benefited much from his outstanding service.

Mr. Norton has traveled extensively at home and abroad and as a self-educated man I dare say he commands an excellent over-all picture of national and international affairs:

CLEM NORTON SAYS

Here's the story on the war, as of the moment, as I see it. It's the most important thing in your life, and in the lives of your children, so take an interest. Nothing is of such importance. This is one of the great terminal points of all history.

Well, there are two sides, and here they are:

One side says: "Get out of Asia and Europe. Protect Japan, the Philippines, and Britain, if the latter cooperates. Mind our own business. Russia will fall apart if she attempts to take over too much. Democracy won't fall. It's the trend. Russia can't even handle Tito. John Foster Dulles and some of the British leaders are inclined to think that we should get out of Korea. We've given billions in food and money to other nations, but when we ask them to help us in Korea they quit, with few exceptions. The United States has only 6 percent of the world's people, and we just have not got enough boys, enough blood, to fight all over the world, and inflation and a huge debt will ruin us at home. The dollar now will only buy fifty-odd cents' worth of what it would a few years ago. It may go down to a nickel. We've fed Italians and given Italy billions of dollars, but there are signs in that land reading: "Take your money and get to hell out." If western Europeans have no will to fight, how can we make them? Not a dollar nor a soldier boy should be sent to protect a foreign land against the Russians, unless the said land itself goes the limit, to get ready to fight. This is only common sense. A Chinese army for the first time has licked a white army in Korea, and this means a tremendous loss of "face" and prestige for us in a land where such things count big. Get our boys out of Korea quick, for it's an impossible situation, and most of them may be killed in an impossible war. Industry is not concentrated in Asia, as it is here, so the use of the atom bomb don't mean so much. Then, in China, with its 450,000,000 people, the cheapest thing is human life. These are among some of the arguments that able men such as Herbert Hoover and Joseph P. Kennedy produce. In Asia are over a billion people, half the world's population, who hate the white man's imperialistic rule, and modern science has taught them how to break that chain. Something now is being born into the world. The Asiatic with only a loin cloth is demanding more. If there was no Russia causing trouble, there would still be trouble in the world, on account of changed conditions. The imperialism of the old days has gone. Education, radio, and so on, are wising people up. No longer will a few nations be able to hold most of the "bread and butter" of the world. Most of the raw materials, without which man cannot advance.

OTHER

Then, the other side of the argument goes like this. We must fight communism everywhere that it takes over, and even drop the atom bomb if and when the right time arrives. If we pull out of Asia, and out of Europe, the Russians will take over. By putting up a fight, by sending Eisenhower to boss the western European armies, and to get them ready to fight Russia, when and if, then Russia knows that we will fight. We need European land bases to fight Russia. Our B-36 planes just cannot cross the ocean and deliver the atom bomb effectively. To let Rome fall to the barbarians would be unforgivable. At least we must do all possible to head off such an eventuality. If Russia gets the technical skill and resources of Europe, she will make it very uncomfortable for us in the Western Hemisphere even though we are surrounded by two oceans, for science makes it easy to cross oceans today, with submarines and guided missiles. If we withdraw to this hemisphere, we will fight alone and perhaps die alone. We'll be handing over to the Russians the most precious of heritages, the world's richest prize—America. Then, what will our grandchildren say?

So, let's put up a fight to hold bases in Asia and Europe. Let's stay there as long as we can. We need time to rearm and those boys who died in Korea helped to buy us that time. Herbert Hoover and Joe Kennedy in 1941 said that we couldn't get into Europe in World War II, or if we did, our efforts would not be effective, but they were wrong in 1941, and they may be wrong in 1951.

MY

Now, here's my opinion. I've read and read, studied and studied, talked to leader after leader, and the problem is so complex, so awful in its complications if we lose out, that I'm all for standing with our President, for we either hang together or hang separately. Nobody really knows just who is right in the above arguments, but the fate of our country, the greatest for the poor man that ever was, a paradise on earth, hangs in the balance, and if we allow the golden hopes of man to trail in the dust, we'll be cursed by generations unborn.

The blackjacking of Secretary Acheson on the eve of his going to the Brussels conference, to weaken him before the world when pleading the cause of free men, by a group of Republicans and others who have no agreed war program of their own, was unfortunate. Politics should stop at the water's edge.

And, in this chaos, what can one think of Stassen and Senator KNOWLAND who demand that President Truman abdicate his powers, something that he cannot do, and allow MacArthur a free military and diplomatic hand in Asia. MacArthur, whose judgment has proven to be so wrong time and again. Splitting up his armies in North Korea, so that the Chinese Communists walk right between our boys and slaughter them in the worst defeat in our history. MacArthur, who knew so little about what the enemy was doing, contemptuously disregarding appropriate warnings, and suggesting our boys would be home by Christmas. Say Lincoln, after McClellan's poor judgment at Bull Run, had had a Stassen or a Knowland barking at his heels to keep McClellan on the job, and not to replace him with a Grant. And while all this goes on, Fulton Lewis, Jr., radio commentator, asks Americans to flood Congress with letters to fire Acheson. But I think the "get Acheson" crowd have shot their bolt and missed. But I like Governor Dewey clearing his speech with President Truman, and I dislike Senator TAFT's attitude, that Republicans should criticize and not cooperate with President Truman at this momentous hour.

The British, to a man, stood behind their Prime Minister Attlee when he came to America a few weeks ago, in the cause of peace. Let's stand behind our leaders in the same manner. So, don't bang our President or his assistants until you've read and studied and thought.

And now, to be personal, and perhaps unobjective, but natural. I love the two-fisted way the President fought for somebody that he loves more than himself, his beloved only child, Margaret.

He had attended her concert at Constitution Hall, the night before, and cried, as he always does, when his daughter sings in public and he is present. Clement Attlee, the Prime Minister of England was with him.

The crowd gave Margaret waves of applause, and then, the next morning, the President woke up to find that Paul Hume, 34-year-old music critic, had said that Margaret couldn't sing, that she sang flat, when everybody who knows music and who has heard Margaret sing, knows that the one thing that she does well is to sing in key, something that even Galli-Curci found it hard to do.

Well, the President, in a hand-written note on White House stationery, told Hume that if he met him he would smash his nose and kick him in the stomach, among other things. Now, everybody knows that the President did not mean it but he was acting just as millions of other dads would under similar circumstances. In short, he was natural, and how fatherly.

I like the manner in which the President walked up and down the conference room while defending Secretary Acheson to the press, at a time when the political bloodhound opposition, for no good reason, demanded Acheson's neck. I like the way in which the President broke out in a big, friendly laugh, on the steps of his home in Independence, Mo., at Christmas time, when a small boy asked: "Will you wait until I go home and get my camera?" I like his presiding at two Masonic meetings in Missouri, with his old cronies—and hence, was never too big to be natural.

In short, I believe that if the election were tomorrow, President Truman, because of his warm naturalness, would be reelected with a greater majority than ever. May God bless and protect him, and guide him, for in some unexplainable way, after reading all that the opposition has to say, I think that he's my man. That he's America's man. That he'll save our great Nation for the children to come.

Herbert Hoover—America's Voice of Strength

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD H. JENISON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. JENISON. Mr. Speaker, seldom have a free people waited with greater concern for their leaders to set a proper course than in the present hour, charged as it is with peril for America and Americans. So it was only proper that President Truman's recent address to the Nation on the international crisis confronting us should receive thoughtful study. But equal consideration should be given the challenging words of former President Herbert Hoover delivered a week later and coming as a voice of strength in an hour of danger.

Despite the striking contrast between the two messages, a strife-torn world should take due note that reexamination of American foreign policy involves no departure from a courageous—and ultimately victorious—defense of the principles embraced by freedom-loving peoples everywhere.

As the Eighty-second Congress gathers in Washington to face the burdensome problems of the days and years ahead it would be well to weigh thoughtfully Mr. Hoover's words. Patriotic Americans have substantial reasons for heeding the counsel given them with the clarity and the force of a great leader whose stature rises to previously unscaled heights for candor, understanding, and vision. This is particularly so because certain forces within the United States Government and elsewhere will seek to distort his words and his views as representing an abandonment of sacrifices so far made at such frightful cost to advance fundamental cause of human rights.

No foundation exists on which to make such a contention, for Mr. Hoover's words voice only renewed devotion to the righteous cause for which Americans have given their lives from Concord to Korea.

It is true Mr. Hoover's analytical appraisal of the world situation contained a clear warning to the United Nations, and particularly to our allies in Europe, that they cannot expect continuing assistance from the American people unless they show a willingness to help themselves.

We can, with our own air and naval forces, so control the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans that there can be no possible invasion of the Western Hemisphere by Communist armies, Mr. Hoover said.

Continental Europe has not developed the unity of purpose and the will power necessary for its own defense, despite 3 years of American assistance. Minds of leaders there are confused with fears and disunities. They exclude Spain from their defense councils, although she has the will and the means to fight. They "haggle" with Germany, as Mr. Hoover remarked, although she is their frontier. And Britain is flirting with Communist China.

The United Nations is in a fog of debate and indecision as to "whether to appease or not to appease." At the very least, as the former President asserted, the UN should declare Communist China an aggressor, call upon its members to cease supplying the Chinese Reds with anything that can aid their military operations, and adopt a resolution condemning the infamous Communist lies about the United States. That, surely, is not asking very much.

Mr. Hoover commended President Truman for his resolute refusal to be a party to any kind of appeasement, and the President may be sure of the overwhelming support of the American people on that issue.

The conference at Brussels this week set up what was called a program for a strong, unified army to defend Western Europe against communism. But, until the vacillating governments in London, Paris, and other European capitals move decisively to create their respective forces, they have no right to ask further American assistance. Armed Communists cannot be turned back by blueprints and vague promises.

Mr. Hoover's thesis that preservation of the Western Hemisphere as the "Gibraltar of western civilization" should be the foundation of American policy may be termed "isolationism." It is that only in the sense that a nation could be isolated by events beyond its own control.

If the Europeans cannot overcome their own trend toward defeatism, Americans need not succumb to it. If we are left an island of strength in a sea of weakness and despair, it will be through no fault or decision of ours, but only because we have been deserted by those who have surrendered to apathy and frustration.

America's future is on trial, to be sure, but so too is America's greatest bid for an effective world organization for world peace—the United Nations. Here Mr. Hoover's words are particularly prophetic. For he said:

Whether or not the United Nations is to have a moral defeat and suffer the collapse of its whole moral stature now depends on whether it has the courage to—

(a) Declare Communist China an aggressor.

(b) Refuse admission of this aggressor to its membership.

(c) Demand that each member of the United Nations cease to furnish or transport supplies of any kind to Communist China that can aid in their military operations. Such a course honestly carried out by the non-Communist nations is not economic sanctions nor does it require military actions. But it would constitute a great pressure for rectitude.

(d) For once, pass a resolution condemning the infamous lies about the United States.

Any course short of this is appeasement.

Just as specific, and just as worthy of considered study, were Mr. Hoover's specific proposals for action. They were seven in number. They were—

First. The foundation of our national policies must be to preserve for this world this Western Hemisphere Gibraltar of western civilization.

Second. We can, without any measure of doubt, with our own air and naval forces, hold the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with one Frontier on Britain (if she wishes to cooperate); the other on Japan, Formosa and the Philippines. We can hold open the sea lanes for our supplies.

Third. To do this we should arm our air and naval forces to the teeth. We have little need for large armies unless we are going to Europe or China. We should give Japan her independence and aid her in arms to defend herself. We should stiffen the defenses of our Pacific frontier in Formosa and the Philippines. We can protect this island chain by our sea and air power.

Fourth. We could, after initial outlays for more air and navy equipment, greatly reduce our expenditures, balance our budget, and free ourselves from the dangers of inflation and economic degeneration.

Fifth. If we toil and sacrifice as the President has asked, we can continue aid to the hungry of the world. Out of our productivity, we can give aid to other nations when they have already displayed spirit and strength in defense against communism. We have the stern duty to work and sacrifice to do it.

Sixth. We should have none of appeasement. Morally there is no appeasement of communism. Appeasement contains more dangers than Dunkirks. We want no more Tehrans and Yaltas. We can retrieve a battle but we cannot retrieve an appeasement.

Seventh. We are not blind to the need to preserve western civilization on the continent of Europe or to our cultural and religious ties to it. But the prime obligation of defense of western continental Europe rests upon the nations of Europe. The test is whether they have the spiritual force, the will, and acceptance of unity among them by their own volition. America cannot create their spiritual forces; we cannot buy them with money.

With the policies outlined by Mr. Hoover, Americans have no reason for hysteria or loss of confidence in our security or our future. And in American security, in this critical hour, rests the future security of all mankind.

Surely, the men and women of America, the sons on the fighting front and their families at home, recognize the solid hope for ultimate triumph. The Hoover proposals do not suggest isolationism. They do not relieve us of working to our utmost. They do offer assurance for preservation of a stronghold of Christian civilization. For the American people, in the words of Mr. Hoover, "have braved difficult and distressing situations in the 300 years we have been on this continent. We have faced our troubles without fear—and we have not failed. We will not fail in this, even if we have to stand alone. But we need to realize the whole truth and gird ourselves for troubled times. The truth is ugly. We face it with prayer and courage."

Mr. Speaker, here in the Congress and abroad in the land there must be a rebirth of Christian devotion and grim determination. Only in such an atmosphere can there be final triumph over the forces arrayed against us. Mr. Hoover's forceful words can mobilize us physically and spiritually for victory in that task.

Testimony From Asia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the New York Times on December 12, 1950:

TESTIMONY FROM ASIA

The Western Powers in general and the United States in particular are placed in a somewhat embarrassing position by the barrage of false Communist propaganda in respect to their imperialism and aggressive intentions. They have given assurances and these are ignored. They can protest against falsehood but they cannot justify themselves in detail without the appearance of self-righteousness.

Into this situation General Romulo stepped on Thursday with an eloquent and detailed answer to the Chinese Communist diatribe against the United States. He made it plain that he was speaking as an Asian for the benefit of other Asians. He recounted his first-hand acquaintance with American imperialism and its fruits in the Philippines. He contrasted American actions, both there and in China, with actions of the Soviet Union "in the same region and at the same point of time," he said, because he believed this was "the most effective way to refute the charges of so-called American imperialism in Asia."

It was this record that he presented to the Chinese Communist representative in these words:

"I say, sir, that you can make this false accusation against so-called American imperialism in Russian, but you cannot say it in Chinese. You cannot say it in Chinese unless you are speaking in translation from Russian. You cannot say it in Chinese because no Chinese who knows the history of his country and who is aware of the long historic friendship between the Chinese people and the American people can make this accusation without sounding as if he were faithfully parroting the stale phrases of Russian propaganda. This country, which has never been at war with China, which was the one great power that took no part in the spoliation of China, which has consistently championed the cause of the Chinese people against their traditional enemies—the Japanese and the Russians—which has generously given help to the Chinese people in adversity, this great country, with such a record, can face the representative of the Peiping regime and shame him into silence."

This is testimony from Asia and it is friendly and welcome at this point. If the Chinese Communists are not willing to accept the expressions of good faith of the west, the Chinese people, whom they misrepresent, may eventually hear the tones of other voices. This certainly is General Romulo's belief and it is for that reason that he speaks. It will serve the cause of freedom if more and more perceptive Asians will raise their voices to join him in his expression of faith and hope when he says:

"In the face of the historical facts and the facts of record we do not believe that the peoples of Asia and, in particular, the Chinese people, will remain deceived for a long time regarding the motives and policies of the United States and the Soviet Union. We understand full well that today the Chinese people are not free, that access to these facts has been barred to them by the machinations of vicious and lying propaganda."

China's Reproach

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to insert the following editorial from the Evening Tribune, Lawrence, Mass., Thursday, December 21, 1950:

CHINESE WILL RUE THE DAY

While we do not wish to seem to be endorsing the my-old-man-can-lick-your-old-man approach to the international crisis, we are pretty well convinced that General Wu is going to one day admit, if he lives to write his memoirs, that the cease-fire proposal was China's last chance to redeem her folly. It is possible to feel a real sorrow for the Chinese people who, because of the cruel and selfish stupidy of their leaders, must postpone for at least another generation any hope of being allowed to use their energies creatively. Instead, they must dissipate such slight reserves of strength as they have to underwrite a psychotic dream of conquest. Debilitated by long economic famine and by the scourge of imperialistic and fratricidal war, they are being herded to another imminent doom.

The seeds of Chinese destruction are in such slight successes as their military overlords are currently boasting about. They have forced society to post them as outlaws and murderers, and society, aroused out of its lethargy, must now take measures. The outlaw is always a tragic figure because he seeks to wrest from society what society would willingly give him. And the outlaw who has no special talent or equipment for it is particularly tragic.

China has been deluded by Russia into believing that rifles are capital goods and that blood can be changed into gold by the alchemy of a thievish war. Russia herself knows better. Josef Stalin and Leon Trotsky quarreled over that very thing in 1925. Trotsky, then Russian commissar for war and a purist of Marxism, wanted to start communizing the world at once. But Dr. Stalin, more of a Fabian Communist, contended that Russia was too anemic and prescribed a protracted regimen of iron. His view prevailed and Trotsky wound up in exile. Russia then devoted 25 years to its fell preparations for world revolution.

Contrastingly, Red China, even before she had extinguished the last sparks of resistance within her own borders, was assigned the very formidable task of engaging the most powerful nation on earth in open conflict. China will, of course, one day find out that she was cynically misadvised by Russia, but that will be of small advantage then.

If the Peiping Government and the North Koreans do not believe they are Kremlin pawns, why do they not make some inquiries as to why they have not been provided with better air and sea support? Russia has a tremendous air force, but few planes have been seen in the skies over Korea. Russia is supposed to have hundreds of submarines, and would not a few of them be able to render effective service, now, in Korean and Formosan waters? The answer is that Russia is interested in her allies in Korea and China only as human roadblocks. Whether they win or lose is of no importance so long as they don't let the fire burn down. Russia is saving her strength for Europe. Eisenhower wasn't appointed a minute too soon.

Nationalism Versus Internationalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the speech delivered over the radio the other night by Mr. John Foster Dulles is to be inserted in the RECORD today, by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

I listened to that rambling defense of the so-called United Nations, which is trying to make of itself a super-government and subordinate the American people to its domination, and I must say that, from my viewpoint, it was just about the "Dullest" piece of international wrangling I have ever heard.

He reminded me of the Englishman shingling his house in a dense fog. He said that before he realized it he had shingled out on the fog 25 or 30 feet.

When I hear one of these wild-eyed internationalists who are always branding us nationalists as "isolationists" go on the air and attempt to justify their international policy that is threatening America with wreck and ruin, I am reminded of that Englishman's experience.

In answer to Mr. Dulles, I am inserting at this point in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement on nationalism issued by Isbrandtsen, one of the great steamship companies of America, whose vessels, for more than 30 years, have touched every shore and entered every port on earth. Read it, and you will understand the bitterness of the American people over this Korean "police action" as reflected in your daily mail.

This statement is unanswerable, and is in line with the speech of Hon. Herbert Hoover which I inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD on December 22, at page A7879, and also with the speech of Hon. Joseph P. Kennedy, which I inserted in the RECORD on January 1, 1951, at page A7909. The statement on nationalism, referred to, follows:

NATIONALISM

National pride is self, home, and country. It is strength and commands respect.

The great debate in this country centers on the question to arm and go all out for war, east and west, or to defend these shores and this hemisphere.

This is not partisanship; it is a grave question that only the citizens of these United States should decide. They do the fighting and make the supreme sacrifice. No man or party of men should gamble with our heritage, barter and trade with our life or death. The foreign and international influences have much to do with our policy or lack of policy.

Many in high places in the legal profession have built up confusions in the interests of their foreign clients to the detriment of this country and its citizens. Self-glorification and a fat fee have done much to confuse our national policies, and left us pro this and pro that. Americanism, nationalism, and national pride lie dormant in fear of persecution by authority, fear of foreign and social recognition. We fear to be different from others. We lack intellectual and moral courage to declare ourselves.

The United Nations, a supergovernment, foisted upon us, has a mandate to deplete our resources, suck our strength, and decide life or death of our people. We have been engineered into an inferiority complex of bowing to our wards and debtors. This lack of national pride was capitalized upon by a foreign directorate to furnish men, money, and material to carry on a war to perpetuate foreign interest at the cost of our own possible destruction or deterioration.

The cry goes out that the United States is in peril and vulnerable. This is a reality. From the United Nations comes the plea we must not quit in Korea. Korea, the graveyard of the flower of our Army. International leaders would risk an all-out war with Asia that they may survive at the cost of American life and treasure. The American people have awakened from an overdose of sleeping pills, hit between the eyes with the realization that the battle of race, creed, and religion became paramount in our way of life. Today we face the threat of annihilation and while the world's advisers put self before service, it was they who led the Horse of Troy into our midst. Europe would sit on the side lines and let us take the blows; America might crumble and the United Nations would become a myth for historians.

The founders of this Republic never intended foreign influences should destroy our institutions, traditions and national honor, nor should they be bartered and traded in and carried out by anyone labeled an American citizen. You are an American, or you are nothing in our way of life. Nationalism is undivided allegiance.

Europe once advised us we did not need a navy, they would defend us. Now comes the plan that we do not need a merchant fleet, they will make our deliveries. It could destroy our sea power, our independence and forever our trade and commerce.

The traditional American policy of requiring free access to the outside world for our commerce, the same reception for our merchant ships abroad as we traditionally grant theirs here—this is our intercourse with foreign peoples.

The average person, while ready in the break-out to take a stand "My country right or wrong," finds it difficult for this same reason of his inherent loyalty to follow the taboos and shiftings of our experts in foreign diplomacy—a buddy today is an enemy tomorrow and around again—disarm him today, put him in arms tomorrow.

We are not a nation of jugglers.

Our greater mental balance in these matters was when our ears were less filled with blarings and blastings before the time, some 35 years ago, when we began concerning ourselves beyond our depth with the political and religious ideologies abroad. That has been all contrary to the traditional policy of this country.

Our earlier way of conducting our own affairs at home should be reinstated—a reformation—so to serve as an example for those abroad to follow if they see fit—we are invincible if we watch and hold on to that way of life—for a better way was never devised. Our founders did not contemplate its corruption.

We should have no less nationalism than the empires of Britain, Russia, and China, the chief ones we are in daily recrimination and disputation with. Each one of these is larger, both in territory and population, than we are—we are only 6 percent of the whole. We do not read about doubt on their part about which flag to hoist on their schools—the UN or their own. They do not keep their treasury open for the world to come and help themselves.

The supergovernment in their own behalf reflects a strong nationalistic doctrine, all the while preaching internationalism for America—creating among the many nationalities of this Nation a confusion and bewilderment to destroy our solidarity in effect accomplishing their own.

The foreign agenda is to take all and give little; this was manifested by the token contribution in the Korean struggle.

We were once called Uncle Shylock. Today we are the undisputed Santa Claus or sucker.

Our State Department, partisan statesmen, and diplomats in their crystal gazing joined with an alien group to change human nature throughout the world. Overlooking at all times the great intercourse of understanding, trade, commerce, and profit without which a nation cannot survive. Peoples throughout the world would rather work for profit than fight for glory and a grave. Nations are built by businessmen; often the diplomat destroys. The average diplomat is guided by an impulse of self, a statesman by realization and vision. A businessman is guided by friendly trade and commerce both at home and abroad—and business alone pays the freight to carry on.

We suggest the return to the delicate art of minding our own business and of telling and insisting that others do likewise—we used to be first-rate at that.

A rereading of the Declaration of Independence, the recreation of a nationalistic spirit with kill-all isms, drop the cloak of hypocrisy, the inferiority complex. Go back to the road of self-determination, self-respect, and self-preservation, the first law of nature.

We have one flag, one country. Let us stop cringing to foreign debtors, wards, and potential enemies.

Let us use the common sense that God gave us.

ISBRANDTSEN.

Way of the Transgressor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LOUIS B. HELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, November 30, 1950

Mr. HELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the New York Times on December 12, 1950:

WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR

The Chinese troops in Korea are proving that the way of the transgressor is not always hard. If he comes in overwhelming strength, no matter how wrong and wicked he is, he can win victories. The defending armies, no matter how good their cause, can be driven back. The lonely places in the wilderness where brave men died for liberty may be remembered forevermore but the battle—in that time and in those places—may nevertheless have been lost.

In that time and in those places—let us always make that qualification. The battle for liberty cannot be permanently lost, for the hunger for liberty cannot die in human hearts. It has been said that some peoples in the modern world want food more than they want liberty. We need not quibble. A starving man has but one instinct. But the food that saves his life—if, indeed, that food is available under a dictatorial system that treats human life like that of the insects in the dust—will also keep alive his higher yearnings.

We have seen defeat in Korea. We have seen an attempted drawing together of the western world to cope with that defeat. We have seen President Truman and Prime Minister Attlee agreeing on the basic principle that aggression shall not be rewarded. The western world has moved slowly. It has awakened slowly to the crisis. But it is awakening—it will move.

Let us look with unlowered gaze at this defeat. It has resulted from failures in preparation, from errors in execution, from unhappy accidents. But it is an army that has been defeated, not a cause. The cause was good when the first United Nations troops landed in Korea. It is still good. It could not be compromised then. It cannot be compromised now. To compromise would be treason to the wounded and the dead who shed their blood for the undying principle of freedom. We would have honored them in victory. We honor them in defeat.

It is more difficult today than at almost any time in modern history to forecast—or even imagine—the future. The leaders of the free nations want no military adventures. They will continue to hope that even the transgressors and aggressors will recoil from the prospect of universal war.

But they will not abandon as of no avail the cause for which the blood of United Nations soldiers has been spent in Korea. The way of the transgressor, if he follows it far and long enough will end at last at a sign that reads no thoroughfare.

War Record of Navy Good

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I wish to include herein an article by Lawrence R. Goldberg, which appeared in the Boston Sunday Post, Boston, Mass., on December 31, 1950:

WAR RECORD OF NAVY GOOD—BRILLIANT AND INSPIRING WORK IS DONE QUIETLY WITHOUT BENEFIT OF PUBLICITY AND SPOTLIGHT

Overlooked in the darkness of the Korean land reverses is the brilliant and inspiring part played quietly, and without benefit of spotlight publicity, by our country's naval forces.

The task that confronted them was a difficult one and became one of major proportions when the size of the naval forces available to oppose the Korean aggression became evident.

These defense forces consisted of nothing more than a small Republic of Korea coast guard, too weak to take any action to prevent movement by sea of forces and supplies for use in operation against the Republic of Korea, including ingress and egress to and from Korean ports of merchant vessels furnishing or likely to furnish assistance to enemy authorities.

DO THE IMPOSSIBLE

In the face of this, and from the very outset of hostilities, our naval forces began to accomplish the almost impossible—doggedly, secretly, without fanfare or communiques, and courageously and effectively.

First they proceeded to effect the waterlift of troops and supplies to Korea, patrol with its aircraft, the water and coastal areas, and then perform escort duties and all necessary coastal patrol functions.

Throughout the offensive actions of the land forces, naval units maintained and continued harassing fire on both coasts—shelling targets susceptible to naval gunfire, breaching roads, and generally interfering with enemy communications. In addition they attacked North Korean water traffic wherever found, and succeeded in destroying practically four-fifths of the vessels originally available to North Korean naval forces and the Communists.

This became of tremendous importance in the wake of the land reverses, and enabled evacuations by water whenever and wherever necessary at a minimum cost and loss of lives.

FIRST CARRIER STRIKE

A new phase of these naval operations got under way on July 3 with the first aircraft carrier air strike. They struck on the west coast of North Korea. Subsequent carrier strikes on the east coast of Korea were made by the British and the United States units. The first amphibious landing by United Nations forces was accomplished on the east coast on July 18 by means of naval action which preceded and continued during the operations.

As the importance of naval action increased, forces were added to the United States units in the foreign waters. Eight nations—British, Australian, Canadian, French, The Netherlands, New Zealand, and United Kingdom figating ships began to augment our forces.

STOP ENEMY

Carrier strikes of increasing frequency were ranged from strategic targets in the north to battlefield targets in close support of all ground movement. Meantime, a day and night patrol on both coasts was directed and maintained primarily toward the interception of enemy shipping to the south, until—as the dark days of reversals approached—all coastal water movement of enemy troops and supplies was stopped.

Imagine what would have happened to our land forces as the reversals continued to mount up, if the Communists had been able to launch an amphibious attack behind our beleaguered lines.

EVERY REQUEST MET

Every request for shore bombardments by our infantry were granted by our naval forces and these proved of immense effectiveness in destroying military targets, harassing the enemy at night and disrupting coastal land communications.

Even when returning to their bases for logistic support, our naval units performed additional tasks of convoying and escorting shipping to and from those ports under control of our troops. The job of evacuating the sick and wounded from Korea to locations of security and better care in Japan was an around-the-clock task. At no time was there any enemy naval interference. The bulk of transport shipping was provided by the United States.

FUNCTIONS SMOOTHLY

Of significance is the fact that the entire naval organization was well integrated, at all times, functioning smoothly, and coordinating efficiently with United Nations army and air force units. So high a degree of efficiency did it reach that at all times it was capable of assuming any type of naval mission in Korean waters.

Without a let-up, our naval forces performed all tasks assigned, and, in addition, steadily increased the ranges of application. Naval aircraft operating from ships performed the battle tasks of reconnaissance, spotting for artillery and naval bombardment, strafing and dive bombing of both tactical and strategic targets.

PROTECT CIVILIANS

Shore bombardment of military targets, harassing fire, and destruction of coastal land communications was carried on continuously by our naval craft. All amphibious landings and water lift of troops were conducted by these surface craft. And throughout it all, our naval bombardment forces, both surfaces and air, exercised every precaution to avoid harming civil population—employing every possible means to identify and destroy military targets only.

While reverses on land were shocking to us, our Navy continued to demonstrate its versatility of application by sustaining with undiminishing intensity all operational tasks undertaken. During every enemy major attack our naval aircraft were almost entirely engaged in an all-out effort in close support of all ground action—continuing this day in and day out.

FISHING CONTINUES

Between breaths, these forces continued their operations against transportation facilities, arsenals, military warehouses, and supply dumps and troop concentrations—miles from land. Other naval craft enabled native fishing operations to continue without any more interruptions by enemy craft and destroyed all Communist watercraft in the area.

These included all small transports and freighters, trawlers, junks, and barges carrying North Korean personnel and supplies.

Not once, despite the seasonal typhoon winds and swollen seas, did our Navy stop in its application of its versatile land, sea, and air elements. Among the most outstanding achievements—not including the marvelous work of evacuation when the tide of battle turned—was the amphibious landing at Inchon, port of Seoul.

The initial landings, made by United States Marines, were supported directly by naval and marine aircraft in coordination with gunfire from cruisers and destroyers, followed by bombarding rocket ships. Naval surface units remained on the scene of the landing to render gunfire support as needed and to give antiaircraft protection to the unloading and harbor activities until their presence was no longer necessary.

"MISSOURI" BIG HELP

The United States battleship Missouri participated in these activities after a spectacularly long trip, and instantly upon arrival proved of enormous value with her great 16-inch guns.

Noteworthy features of these amphibious operations were the Navy's clockwork coordination, strict adherence to schedule, and the overcoming of natural obstacles, especially in the extraordinary tidal conditions and limited maneuvering room for large vessels.

These activities continued in the face of enemy sea mines introduced by Communist aircraft into the areas of naval operations. Every day, many free-drifting Soviet-made mines were sighted at sea and exploded and sunk by our units.

THOUSANDS OF BOYS SAVED

Unremitting pressure on the enemy by our naval units saved thousands of our boys and reduced the loss in our matériel. At one time more than 350 cargo and transport type vessels were concentrated off the Korean coast—engaged in a do-or-die task—and were able to carry out their mission without a single mishap by enemy action, as a result of the gallant and meritorious work of our Navy.

While this was going on enemy action was concentrated in a desperate effort to break through the naval protection—but without the slightest success. This included the planting and dropping of enemy mines in coastal waters, and the mining was indiscriminate by the Communists without regard to international law or the safety of noncombatants at sea.

REDS DISREGARD LAW

It is a well-established principle of international law that live mines must be moored or otherwise fixed in place. International law specifically forbids the use of unanchored automatic contact mines, except when they are so constructed as to become harmless one hour, at most, after being laid.

As a related matter, it required that moored mines shall be so constructed as to insure that they will become harmless as soon as they have broken from their moorings.

Twenty-five of these mines are now in the possession of United States Navy Intelligence. They were made in Soviet Russia during the past year.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I received through the mail, a short time ago, from Charles Granville Hamilton, rector of St. Paul's Church, Corinth, Miss,, the following verses, which, although perhaps lacking in poetic dignity, brings to the Nation a message long overdue.

I have never met Rector Hamilton personally and made his acquaintance only recently when he sent to me two of his literary efforts, one a sermon in which he stated the benefits and the evils of the hour and the other a radio broadcast in which he analyzed the votes of the last election and proved therein conclusively that in the off-year 1950 the Republicans suffered a signal defeat instead of winning a glorious victory.

The Governor rose with his loaded dice,
And viewed with alarm his favorite vice;
The child was plainly no Angle Saxon,
So Fielding Wright took a plane to Jackson,
A voice whooped out from Badgerland,
I'll write you a story for only ten grand.
By nature's bear-pelt I proudly wear,
On Douay's edition I solemnly swear,
By my thinny thin, skin,
A Red I see in all this din,
Of Yuletide mirth and joy serene
Way up in a tree amid the green.
Re-pubs croaked out let's kill the brats,
Cause they'll grow up to be Democrats.
Alfonsie said 'tis only a strike,
They left their work for an evening hike,
To look at a little ole child in a manger
This union of shepards is clearly a danger.
Others were sure that God would not choose,
To come to the world in a family of Jews.
The shepard said: "We're only human,
If we lived today we'd vote for Truman."
Doc Gallup commented: "Ninety-nine point seven
Agreed there have never been voices from Heaven;
They are but saucers flying and similar things,
Who claims they've heard those rustling of wings?"

Some typical Southland mountaineers
Claimed this starts a new series of years—
"Obviously shepherding makes one obtuse"—
This was the gospel, according to Luce.
On a magazine cover the Man of the Year
Was Herod the Tycoon, strong and sincere.
The Hearst press was headlined: "If God should come,
Would He not bring us a hydrogen bomb?"
Old crusty kept grumbling: O What a pity
To let such DP's enter our city.
And Hollywood grimaced: "A preposterous plot,
And what heavenly choir wasn't so hot."
But Gabriel Heatter for once was right
When he cheerily chortled "There's good news tonight!"

Weary with years of statesmanlike service,
The Un-American Committee was visibly nervous:
Foreigners come without paying a tax—
Immigration officials surely were lax—
Subversive teachings like peace and good will—
Have we no general we can send to kill?
One who knows how to shoot in the back—
The present administration surely is slack.
Dixiecrats yelped: "This good will to men Fails to specify color and race, where and when."
When he learned that good will was not only for whites,
Walter Sillers walked out against such civil rights.

"To say they were wise men was plainly a mania,"
Said President Stassen of Pennsylvania.
They traded no treasures for a college degree;
They had no press agent, no newsy plea.
No girl friends were with them. The camels they rode
Were not photogenic, nor was their strange load.
DeWolfe was sure that if they were wise
Their gold would have helped some cathedral arise.
The Press was sure that their coming from far
Was proof they were led by some strange scarlet star;
While Goppy-Birds hissed that to waste on a Child
What could balance a budget was certainly wild;
And Pegler was sure that to give to poor Jesus
Would start up New Deals and such awful diseases.
Johnny Flynn tumbled over in glee on his bed
As he heard Herod's horsemen down the road ahead,
And posed Readers' Digest: "Is all this just bait,
Angels, babies, and stars, for a new welfare state?"
Good will is no slogan to win voters with
Was the clear-cut comment of two men with pith
While Herman agreed: No peace do I find
When dear old Georgia's on my mind.

The mongrels bark and the donkeys bray,
Now, as of old, on Christmas day;
But what we remember is more than they.

A Comparison of American and Soviet Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HUGH BUTLER
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article by Robert G. Simmons, entitled "Do We Want What They Have?—A Comparison of American and Soviet Democracy."

Mr. Simmons is the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Nebraska, one of the most distinguished citizens of my State. He was for 10 years a Member of Congress, and I might add, a close personal friend of mine for many years. The article appeared in the November 1950 issue of the American Bar Association Journal.

Mr. President, it seems to me that this article is so much to the point and so clear an exposition of the tremendous gap between Communist promises and the actual results of communism that it might well be useful for distribution in the magazines and newspapers of foreign countries.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, as follows:

DO WE WANT WHAT THEY HAVE?—A COMPARISON OF AMERICAN AND SOVIET DEMOCRACY

(By Robert G. Simmons, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Nebraska)

Some months ago I sat in a public meeting in Madison Square Garden in New York. During the evening I heard the President of the United States ridiculed, the Congress damned, our courts scorned, and the Constitution of the United States condemned. I was an observer at a meeting held for the purpose of raising money to aid in the defense of Communist leaders then on trial. I witnessed multiplied hundreds stand with the raised clenched-fist salute of the Communist, while they cheered the head of the visible Communist Party in this country, approved his attacks on our system of government, and pledged in effect to continue the fight in this country until our institutions were remodeled to accord with those of the Soviets.

I asked myself then, as I ask you now, do we want what the Communist countries have?

This country has come tardily, too tardily, to a realization that we face a menace from communism—not in Moscow, or Budapest, or Praha, but in the United States. We shall not meet this challenge successfully by merely being against communism and damning Communists. We should examine their system of government, look at its parts, and decide whether or not we want any or all of it in America, bearing in mind that we are one of the few great peoples in the world who yet have the power to make that decision.

I propose briefly to do that with you as we think about it together.

Our difficulty in understanding what the Communist and Soviet leaders say is that they use our words with their meaning. It is the difficulty which our officials in Washington face in dealing with them. We must first translate our language into their meaning in order to reach a common understanding of their system of government, their ideologies, and even their promises.

Let me illustrate. They speak of representative government and we think of our system where, by open elections, we choose between the candidates of different parties, representing different basic views or governmental policies. We choose between men and plans. The Soviet elector has only one set of candidates and one party, and approves only that which the party submits. That is their idea of representative government.

CONTRAST BETWEEN AMERICAN DEMOCRACY AND SOVIET DEMOCRACY

They speak of democracy, and we think of our own. We fail to recognize the fundamental difference. With us, democracy represents a government where the reservoir of political power rests in the 150,000,000 folk who make up our citizenship where we measure out, guardedly, the power that our officials are permitted to exercise, and where officials are servants, not masters. The Soviet uses our word "democracy," but as meaning a government where the reservoir of political power rests on the closely knit 2 or 3 percent of the people that make up the Communist Party, where the people exercise only those privileges that the Communist Party permits them to exercise from time to time, and where officials are masters, not servants.

They have courts. When they refer to them we think of our own judicial systems with all their independent powers, subject to constitutional limitations and grants of power. We do not recognize the fact that the courts of the Soviet system are but subordinate administrative agencies of the Communist Party.

The Communist speaks of the constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and we think of our own Federal and State constitutions, and somehow think that they have what we have. Our constitutions speak the mandate of the people; theirs, the mandate of the Communist Party. Our constitutions were adopted by action of the people taken for that direct purpose. Their constitutions were promulgated by Communist Party bodies and never were submitted, and it is not intended that they ever shall be submitted, to the people of the Soviet countries for their adoption or rejection. Our constitutions cannot be changed except by action of the people taken for that purpose. The Soviet constitution can be and has been repeatedly changed by action of the creating body. Those changes have not been, and it is not intended that they shall be, submitted to the people of the Communist nations for their approval or rejection. Do we want their kind of a constitution?

SOVIET CONSTITUTION CONTAINS NO PROTECTION AGAINST GOVERNMENT

Our constitutions are either grants or limitations of power to officials of government. Let us make some comparisons there.

Search their constitutions. You will not find there any such provisions as are in our own providing for the writ of habeas corpus, the right of trial by jury, the right of appeal. Neither will you find provisions against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, or other similar provisions. Those guaranties and many others are in our constitutions for a reason. They are there to protect people, individual persons, from the abritrary power of officials of government; they serve that purpose in America. The people, individually and collectively, under the Soviet system do not have such safeguards. Do we want to surrender that which we have?

During these last years we have again had cause to examine into our Bill of Rights. If you have not lately read the first 10 amendments to the Federal Constitution, then I suggest that some evening soon you do so—seriously, thoughtfully. You will find no words in the Soviet constitution comparable to the first five words of the first amendment—"Congress shall make no law." There is no such denial of power in the Soviet constitution. Do we wish to surrender that prohibition on the power of governments?

The first of the 10 amendments is, in full: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Some of us call the guaranties of our Constitution inherent rights; some call them individual rights; some call them civil rights; some call them the God-given rights of men that governments must respect and must not invade.

But the Communists tell us that they have similar rights provided for in their constitution. Their provisions are:

"Article 124: In order to insure to citizens freedom of conscience, the church in the U. S. S. R. is separated from the state, and the school from the church. Freedom of religious worship and freedom of antireligious propaganda is recognized for all citizens.

"Article 125: In conformity with the interests of the working people, and in order to strengthen the Socialist system, the citizens of the U. S. S. R. are guaranteed by law:

"(a) Freedom of speech.

"(b) Freedom of the press.

"(c) Freedom of assembly, including the holding of mass meetings.

"(d) Freedom of street processions and demonstrations.

"These civil rights are insured by placing at the disposal of the working people and their organization printing presses, stocks of paper, public buildings, the streets, communications facilities, and other material requisites for the exercise of these rights."

I shall not here comment upon the difference in meaning of our "Congress shall make no law" and the Soviet phrase "is recognized." Neither shall I dwell upon the "by law" provisions of the Soviet constitution, save to point out that by our meaning that provision is inoperative unless affirmative legislation is enacted.

Rather, let us find out what these so-called guaranties mean in the language of the Communist.

VISHINSKY EXPLAINS SOVIET THEORY OF RIGHTS

I refer now to the Law of the Soviet State by Vishinsky, presently Foreign Minister of Russia, formerly Commissar of Justice, and a recognized authority and lecturer on Soviet law. Vishinsky states that the source of civil rights in that land is in the government "rather than in any myth as to man's natural and inherent rights" (p. 563). So we start with a basic difference in the source of civil rights. If, as they contend, that source is in their social organization, that it gives the rights, then of necessity, the same power can take them away. Do we want to accept that philosophy?

Vishinsky says that lying at the foundation of all the legislation of the Soviet state on the matter of religion is the proposition of having a "negative attitude toward religion, carrying high the banner of militant atheism"; they have "initiated from the very earliest days a planned and decisive struggle with religion"; they aspire "to liberate the conscience from religious superstition" (p. 607). Following these aims, and apparently as an intermediate step to the ultimate accomplishment of "militant atheism" among Communist peoples, all property of churches and religious societies was confiscated and declared to be public property; the religious organizations were denied any legal status; they are permitted the use of special buildings "exclusively for religious purposes"; they are required to register with the civil authorities in a "special manner"; their right to administrative organizations is limited—"local Soviets supervise the activity of religious organizations" and "religious organizations are forbidden to create funds for mutual assistance, cooperatives, or production units, to organize other than religious assemblies, groups, excursions, libraries, reading rooms, or the like—anything, that is to say, not immediately related to the basic functions of religious organizations" (p. 609).

He summarizes the result of their governmental policy to date in this language: "The struggle with religion is * * * carried on, not by administrative repressions, but by the Socialist refashioning of the entire national economy which eradicates religion, by Socialist reeducation of the toiling masses, by antireligious propaganda, by implanting scientific knowledge, and by expanding education. The mass exodus of U. S. S. R. toilers away from religion is directly due to these measures taken in their entirety" (p. 609).

DO WE WANT MILITANT ATHEISM?

Do we in America want our institutions of government to be refashioned so as to eradicate religion and so as to establish militant atheism as the basic governmental policy? I need but ask you to recall what has happened to religious organizations, priests, ministers, folk of faith in the countries behind the iron curtain. Do we want what they have?

We are told that article 125 guarantees the rights there set out. What do they mean in the language of the Soviet?

Vishinsky says: "Having given the toilers freedom of speech, assemblies, street parades, press, and so on, the Soviet Government explicitly excluded the nonlabor classes from enjoyment of this freedom" (p. 614). Who are the nonlabor classes to whom this freedom is excluded?—and what a contradiction of terms. He answers: "One of the first and most important measures of the Soviet Government in assuring actual freedom of the press in behalf of the toilers was the closing * * * of numerous organs of the counterrevolutionary press" (p. 615). In short, freedom of the press is denied to those who would oppose the policies of the Government.

Vishinsky refers to "our papers" and the law standing guard for the Soviet press by providing "for political-ideological control" of the press "to prohibit the issuance, publication, and circulation of productions * * * containing agitation and propaganda against Soviet authority and proletarian dictatorship" (p. 616). To violate Soviet legislation concerning the press carries criminal penalties. Vishinsky says: "In our state, naturally, there is and can be no place for freedom of speech, press, and so on, for the foes of socialism. Every sort of attempt on their part to utilize to the detriment of the state * * * these freedoms granted to toilers must be classified as a counterrevolutionary crime * * *. Freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, of meetings, of street parades, and of demonstrations are the property of all the citizens in the U. S. S. R., fully guaranteed by the state upon the single condition that they be utilized in accord with the interests of the toilers and to the end of strengthening the Socialist social order" (p. 617). Vishinsky says: "The Soviet state * * * does not include freedom of political parties in the enumeration of these freedoms granted" (p. 627), and that "only one party can exist—the Communist Party" (p. 628).

DO WE WANT FREEDOM TO SUPPORT ONLY PARTY IN POWER?

Do we want their sort of freedom of the press, of assembly, of speech, of political parties, in our America—a freedom to be exercised only to support and not to oppose the policies of the party in power? To oppose communism by speech or by press in the iron-curtain countries is a crime. Do we want that to be the law of the United States? Do we want what they have?

But of what avail is it to have guaranteed rights of any kind in constitutions unless there is an agency of Government that has the power to make those rights effective as against the actions of the Government itself? In this country the courts, State and Federal, have the power to say to officials of Government, "These things you undertake to do you cannot do, because the people have denied or not granted you the power that you seek to exercise." Constitutional guaranties are supreme, and effectively so, through the agencies of the courts. If any official of Government undertakes to invade your rights guaranteed by the Constitution, it is not necessary that you go to your State capital and seek out some official and implore him to protect your rights; you need not go to Washington and there seek someone who will undertake to intervene for you. In America the individual has the right, and I emphasize right as against privilege—the individual has the right to go to the court located in his county and there challenge the power of the Government and secure a judicial determination of whether or not his rights are invaded. If it is found that constitutional rights are invaded, the courts have the power to stay the strong arm of the Government itself. That power of the judiciary is the peculiar genius of our institutions that makes constitutional rights effective.

But the Soviet says "We have courts," and they do—but without the all-important power of the courts of America to enforce and make effective constitutional rights of the individual. The courts of Russia are but administrative agencies of the government, subject to administrative direction and control. Lenin is quoted as having said that the courts were organized to force discipline on the working class. The Soviet courts do not have the power to protect the individual from governmental action, but rather are used to enforce administrative governmental decisions. One of their early writers said in effect that a club is a primitive weapon, a rifle an effective one, but the most efficient method for a government to control a people is a court that officials of government control. Such constitutional rights as are recognized in those countries are effective only insofar as the Communist Party and its controlled agencies, including the courts, permit. I need do no more here than call your attention to the procedures, powers, and decision of the so-called courts of the Communist countries which they have permitted to be told to us. Contrast their system with ours. Do we want what they have?

Time does not permit a detailed discussion. I suggest that you seriously weigh the rights that men and women in industry, in the professions, in the social agencies, in business, in any vocation, have in America. Then study and weigh comparable privileges—not rights—in the Communist countries. Finally, after you have summed up—ask yourself, Do you, individually, want what they have in Russia and the Communist countries in lieu of what you now have and can achieve for yourself in America. Do you want what they have?

I can sum up the whole matter in these short sentences. Our constitutional system, our laws, our courts, are designed to protect the individual person and people as a whole from the unauthorized power of government. The Communist system is designed to protect those in control of the government from the power of the people. Therein lies the difference between liberty and the lack of it in an organized society. May I suggest that you study our system and theirs, and that as you do so, you ask yourself these questions: Is there a difference between our system of government and that of the Communists? If so, is that difference in favor of the American system? If so, is it a difference worth preserving? And if so, are you doing all in your full power to maintain and strengthen the institutions of government that are ours?

Those questions I leave with you.

Civilian Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. BOLTON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. BOLTON of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, my primary purpose in making these remarks is to awaken in the minds of our civilian population the real danger of atomic attack, also to emphasize the responsibility resting on the leaders of our society in local communities to impress upon their people the necessity of establishing at once a civil-defense program in order to minimize as far as possible a sudden devastating attack against the United States of America. Immediate preparation by volunteers for protection of our civilian population is imperative, but the apathy of our people is interfering with this program in most of our communities and should be corrected immediately, so that in the event of an attack, our civilian morale will be maintained and interference with our production capacity to equip our fighting men will be reduced to a minimum.

It has been reported that the President of the United States has said that Russia had 45 atomic bombs early in 1950. It has also been said that we have 10 times that many atomic bombs. But it would be scant comfort to the people of any of our large cities or ports if the Russians got through with even one bomb, and found our people lacking in adequate civilian-defense preparation. Should Russia decide to strike, we can feel confident she will not give us any advance notice, and that is why it is so vitally important that our civilian population get about the job of planning for our future safety and welfare without a moment's delay.

Casualties among civilians during the next war will, in all probability, far exceed those in the enlisted personnel of the armed services. Facing cold realities, world war III is not only a possibility but a real probability, and atomic bombs could come crashing down on the heads of our civilian population without a moment's warning.

Suppose a bomb were to crash on Baltimore City today—Baltimore is typical of any city in the United States—wiping out some 200,000 to 300,000 of its citizens, a large percentage of our doctors and nurses, destroying our hospitals, our light and power facilities, and abolishing the water system for Baltimore City and the surrounding metropolitan area:

How would we act?

What would we do?

How would we go about protecting ourselves?

Who would try to bring order out of chaos?

Who would coordinate rescuing activities?

Where would we get water to drink?

What could we do to protect ourselves from the hazards of radioactivity?

These are only a very, very few of the questions to be answered, and every community should have well-trained volunteers available immediately to answer any and all such questions.

Congress laid the groundwork for civilian defense by passing the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950, setting up the Federal agency to handle civilian defense and outlining the part to be played by the States and the various communities within the States. Our citizens throughout this Nation should immediately follow through this program.

We all know, of course, that it would be foolhardy for the Russians to waste atomic bombs on rural communities, therefore, it is reasonable to presume that they will concentrate their fury on our cities, our ports, our large industrial areas, our oil refineries, and our transportation centers, but the radius surrounding these areas is a matter of conjecture.

Much has been said about the damage resulting from an atomic bomb and how far the effects of the bomb would carry. For instance, atomic scientists say that practically all persons within a half mile of the explosion would meet instant death; of those within a radius of 1 mile from the explosion, 50 percent would be killed; and on out to a radius of 2 miles, where comparatively few would lose their lives. One hears such remarks as, "Well, I live 3 miles from the closest large plant, or from the port of Baltimore, so it is unlikely that my home would be affected." We must realize, however, that a few seconds' mistake in timing might mean that the bomb would be dropped several miles from the proposed target, so those of us who live within an area of as much as 15 or 20 miles from the target might become atomic-bomb victims through an error on the part of some nervous pilot.

I am hopeful that our radar screen will pick up any approaching enemy planes. However, it is almost inconceivable to think that none could get through to their target. Now is the time to get our civilian defense units organized. Now is the time to impress upon our people the danger with which we are faced. Of course, our people would become aroused in the event of attack, but then it would be too late. Bomb shelters cannot be built overnight and neither can civil defense units be trained so that if an attack comes, we may handle the resultant damage with the least possible confusion. Only by such teamwork as exists among well-trained groups can we hope to aid the distressed, fight fires, and restore order in our communities with the least possible delay. And it takes considerable time to train such personnel. That is the reason our people should be made conscious of the critical situation that now exists.

And yet, notwithstanding the fact that we are facing this startling situation and the gravest crisis in all history, our people, in many instances, go drifting on, seemingly indifferent to the possibility of impending disaster. This condition exists only because the leaders in civic, churches, and other endeavors are not doing their duty in impressing upon our people the seriousness of the situation.

Korea has certainly unmasked communism of its propaganda-painted peace-loving pretention. We certainly know now that the Communists will go to war if necessary to attain their objective of world conquest.

The fact that the Soviet Union stood ready to assist Communist China in their push in Korea clearly demonstrates that they are prepared now to risk a war between the free peoples of the world and the Communist-dominated nations. No, world war III is not impossible but a real probability and the sooner our people realize it, the better.

A brief résumé of the military might of Russia in comparison with that of our country should make us shudder:

Russia has 187 divisions well equipped and ready to move immediately, whereas, we have only 14 divisions and 80 percent of these are in the Pacific.

Russia has embarked on a program of building 1,000 submarines and has already completed 360. We must remember that it took only 50 submarines to practically drive Great Britain and ourselves off the high seas in World War II.

We know Russia is stockpiling the atomic bomb and possesses the planes that can leave Russian soil on a nonstop flight and drop the bombs on any eastern seaboard community within 12 hours from starting time.

Russia has more than 50,000 tanks—outnumbering us many, many times.

She has embarked upon a program of building a four-fleet navy, which is certainly cause for sober thought. We are told that the timetable for completion of her full war-footing program is 1952. On the other hand, we have seen ourselves during the past 6 years drift from the greatest military power recorded in all history to being so weak that we are kicked around by Red China, inviting attack and possible disaster. Yes; if these facts were only presented to our people, civilian defense would be of first order in every community.

My friends, in 30 years we have seen communism spread from only a philosophy of Marx to an engulfing threat to the entire world; in fact, the United States is the only Nation today that can withstand the onslaught of communism standing alone.

In the past 6 years we have seen communism spread from the Baltic Sea to the China Sea. In the past 18 months we have seen aggression in West Germany, Trieste, and Indochina. During the same short period we have seen Russia assume control of the Polish Army; we have seen conditions arise in Bulgaria causing the breaking off of diplomatic relations with this country. We have seen one of our planes shot down over the Baltic, murdering 10 of our fine young men. And, finally, we have discovered that they will resort to war to obtain their objective. Yes; communism is on the march and when deceit, intrigue, and subversive tactics fail, judging from past performances, force is inevitable.

Do you think it reasonable to assume that Russia will wait until we arm Europe and prepare for her defeat? Is it not possible that she will feel that in the interest of her own self-defense she should strike before we are ready?

Will Russia stand by and let the leaders of the free nations accuse her of banditry? Is not the exchange of harsh words between the leaders of the world sufficient to convince one that war is possible at any moment?

A bird's-eye view of this horrible situation will certainly convince any reasonable mind that preparedness on the part of our population should be a matter of paramount importance. Our civilian-defense units throughout our country must act immediately.

So, I repeat, let us all do what we can to impress upon our people in every city, hamlet, and town the urgent necessity of perfecting their civil-defense programs immediately. We all must act now.

Further Report on the Medical Profession

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EUGENE D. O'SULLIVAN
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, December 22, 1950, the Washington Post, of Washington, D. C., carried the following startling information:

ONE-THIRD CALLED UNFIT—HIGH REJECTION RATE OF DOCTORS PUZZLES AREA DRAFT OFFICIALS

(By Sam Stavisky)

Army and Selective Service officials are disturbed over the high rate of physical rejection among draft-liable doctors in some sections of the country, it was learned yesterday.

The authorities have been relieved to discover, following a quick unofficial survey, that the national physical rejection rate among the draft-registered physicians, dentists, and veterinarians is only around 17 percent. This figure approximates the physical-rejection rates for the regular 19-through-25 selectees.

But the officials are considerably concerned, in particular sections, with the abnormally high rejection rates such as the Second Army area, which includes the District of Columbia, Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky.

In the Second Army area, it was learned, nearly one-third of the medical men classified as 1-A and sent up to the 26 area induction centers have been turned back as unfit for duty because of physical disability.

Second Army medical officers are particularly perturbed over the situation because only recently a group of Medical Reserve officers was given a similar physical checkup, and although these men were for the most part 35 to 50 years of age, the rejections for physical disability amounted to only around 10 percent.

Yet the draft-liable doctors—who are chiefly in the 30-to-36-year bracket, and, like the reservists, were qualified to serve during World War II—are now showing up with a physical rejection rate which is 3 times that of the older men.

There's another comparison that makes the Pentagon unhappy over the Second Army rejection rate for medical men.

The latest available figures for the regular draft shows that only 15 percent of the 19-through-25-year-old selectees is being turned back as physically unfit. That figure is only one-half of the rate for the medical men 30 to 36 who are being disqualified.

No official is willing to suggest publicly what the trouble might be, but privately some of the authorities object to the present arrangement under which the draft-liable doctors are given their preinduction exams by other civilian doctors. Critics of the present examining system insist that the rejection rate would be lower were the exams given by military physicians. It is known that such a suggestion has been urged on Selective Service, along with a proposal to reexamine all cases of physical disqualification among the draft-liable doctors.

On the following day, December 24, 1950, the same newspaper carried this item of news:

SERVICE-SHY DOCTORS FACE LOSS OF RANK—THOSE WHO SPURNED COMMISSIONS MAY ENTER AS PRIVATES

(By Sam Stavisky)

Draft-eligible doctors who have been refusing to become Reserve officers in the Army now face the prospect of getting a lower-rank commission or being drafted as privates, it was learned yesterday.

Dr. Richard L. Meiling, Defense Department Medical Chief, said that by January 15, the Army medical corps no longer will be able to commission any of the draft-liable (priority I) physicians as majors.

After January 15, notwithstanding his age and professional qualifications, the draft-liable doctor volunteering for a Reserve commission will have to accept a captaincy or a lieutenancy, according to Dr. Meiling. And there aren't many captaincies available, either, he added.

The latecomers into the Medical Reserves—who are waiting for the last minute before draft induction to apply for commissions—will find the most desirable assignments, such as staffing the major general hopitals, are unavailable, Dr. Meiling said. They will be assigned instead to the field with the new Army divisions in training.

The Defense Department's Medical Director said that the military authorities were fully cognizant of the fact that a considerable minority of physicians, dentists, and veterinarians in priority I—men who were deferred for training during World War II and who saw less than 90 days' service—has refused to accept proferred Reserve commissions.

Dr. Meiling said some of these reluctant physicians may be under the false impression that by refusing commissions they will escape military service, because the Government has been hesitant about drafting any doctors.

"It can be flatly stated," said Dr. Meiling, "that all physically qualified medical men in priority I, not deemed essential to the national or community welfare in their civilian jobs, will be called into the Armed Forces via the Reserves or via the draft."

Meiling observed that expansion of the Armed Forces to 3,500,000 as ordered by President Truman means that a minimum of 8,000 physicians will be needed to meet the requirements of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, probably by next July.

The recent registration of priority I medical men disclosed 9,000 physicians in this category, of whom 4,000 have already been classified as 1-A.

The Defense Department's medical chief observed that every available physician in priority I must be brought into the service via commissioning or draft, before a call is issued for priority II—approximately 5,000 physicians given draft deferments to continue their training in World War II and who later served in uniform less than 21 months.

Draft-liable physicians volunteering for commissions get $100 a month extra in pay. Those who will be drafted will not only be taken in as privates, with privates' pay, but also will lose the $100-a-month bonus.

"If a physician proves to be so selfish that he doesn't think he ought to serve his country, and won't serve unless he is drafted, then we will have to evaluate him to determine whether or not he has the humanitarian qualifications for treating service," Dr. Meiling said. The drafted physician's military assignment would then be determined by such an evaluation.

Latest available figures show that in the eight-State Second Army area, which includes the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia, that one-third of the physically qualified 1-A physicians have thus far rejected commissions. In the District, out of 16 priority I physicians qualified for commissions, seven have indicated a preference to be drafted.

On December 23, 1950, the Evening Star, of Washington, D. C., published the following news item:

DRAFT-REJECTED DOCTORS MAY BE EXAMINED AGAIN—OFFICIALS STUDYING STEPS IF RATE IS FOUND OUT OF LINE

The possibility of reexamining draft-liable doctors in some areas as the result of high physical rejection rates is under careful study by Pentagon officials, it was reported today.

As yet no definite steps have been planned. But one high military source said that if studies now under way show rejection rates to be "really out of line," it is expected that those rejected will be ordered for reexamination, probably at military hospitals.

In the Second Army area, which includes the District, officials said young physicians have been rejected for physical reasons alone at the incredible rate of between 25 and 30 percent. All those ordered for examination either were trained at Government expense during the war or were otherwise deferred to continue medical education. On the national level, physical rejections are running about 17 percent.

RATE HIGH IN DISTRICT

In the District, the rejection rate was even higher. Of 35 physicians ordered up, one source reported, 16 were rejected. It was pointed out, however, that the 35 was too small a number from which to draw general conclusions.

Meanwhile, Second Army officials plan to make a breakdown of the rejection picture, so that officials in the District and seven States covered by the area can be given a clear picture of reasons for the rejections.

MAY CALL BACK RESERVISTS

Reports of the high rejection rates also raised concern among some civilian doctors that the Army might be forced to call back Reservists with wide World War II service in order to meet medical needs. But Army officials said that before that happens steps will be taken to induct young draft-liable doctors who have refused to accept commissions voluntarily. As yet, however, the Army has not passed along a medical draft call to selective service officials.

On the nonmedical draft front, District officials have suspended weekly induction of youths until after the Christmas holidays. The next mass induction will be held January 3.

On December 25, 1950, the Washington News had the following to say in reference to the publicity given the doctors by other newspapers:

"A DASTARDLY STATEMENT"—CIVILIAN MEDICAL EXAMINERS DEFENDED

Dr. Richard Meiling, Director of the Defense Department's Office of Medical Services, has denied an inference published recently (not in the News) that civilian medical examiners are trying to get their fellow doctors out of the draft.

Dr. Meiling called the report "as dastardly a statement as any man could make and damaging to the mobilization effort."

He said that any draft-eligible doctors that are turned down because of physical disabilities have their cases reviewed by the Army Surgeon General's office "regardless of who examines these men."

He said the Air Force and Navy have accepted more volunteer doctors than the Army has even processed and gave this as a reason for the high rate of physical rejection by Selective Service in some areas. So the Army can catch up with the other services, he said, they have agreed temporarily to take no more volunteer doctors.

A spokesman for the Surgeon General said the average rejection figure for doctors over the Nation is about 15 to 17 percent and any rejection rate in local areas is "nothing to get alarmed about. It will eventually straighten itself out."

"The checks and balances in the induction system will smoke out any irregularities," he said, "but I doubt if it's true there are any."

The Second Army area, which includes the District, Maryland, Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio, has reported a rejection of close to 30 percent.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of all and all accusations and excuses the whole sorry mess, however, adds up to this: That many members of the medical fraternity in the United States received their professional education at the expense of the United States Government; that while they were receiving this education they were spared all of the perils and rigors of shooting wars; that in many instances, the World Wars were over before they were graduated, and they entered private practice and lives of hitherto unknown comfort and even luxury; that they lacked both gratefulness and patriotism when we became involved in the present conflict and would not volunteer to help their fellow Americans in the military service and the great country which made it possible for them to have a profession; that it became necessary for the Eighty-first Congress to pass a law, drafting them into the United States military services; that they waited for their draft call and when examined either were so unfit physically by nature or by design that they could not pass a physical examination; and as a result of their failure to be physically fit were permitted to hobble back to their various lucrative practices.

Is it not a strange state of affairs that these men are permitted by law to attempt to heal others when they cannot or will not heal themselves?

Of course it was the mistake of mistakes to do as was done in both World Wars I and II, to let any grossly physical incompetent ever study medicine or any other profession during the war years and prior thereto. That is one reason why many medical men and dentists cannot pass their physical examinations now. They were physically incompetent when they commenced their medical studies.

That is one big reason why the medical and dental professions are guilty of such unnatural behavior for the past few years, and is one of the reasons why these professions have manifested such devilish cruelty toward both civilian and military persons.

We should remember that no truer words were ever spoken than those of the Latin scholar who said: "A sound mind in a sound body."

For the past several generations an abundance of sympathy has been extended to the physically handicapped, and I find no fault with such notions, but I do say that these unfortunate people should not be permitted to take over the medical, dental, or any other profession. Neither should they be selected or elected to positions of authority in Government at any level. The physically and mentally fit only should be permitted to enter the professions and have the duties and responsibilities of Government entrusted to them.

I do hope that President Truman will pick able-bodied men and women from the various branches of the armed services and give them educations in the medical, dental, and other allied professions so that our Nation may again have real doctors instead of incompetents and morons at the medical helm in our great country.

Case History of a Smear

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, December 11, 1950

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues the following article entitled "Case History of a Smear," written by Arnold Heidenheimer, which appeared in the New Republic for December 25, 1950.

I hope that a perusal of it will cause Members to pause and give full and thorough consideration to similar matters in the days ahead, before rushing in with rash and unfounded charges. The above-mentioned article follows:

CASE HISTORY OF A SMEAR

(By Arnold Heidenheimer)

A month or so ago two old acquaintances met for lunch in Washington. They discussed the request of General Marshall for the appointment of Mrs. Anna Rosenberg as his Assistant Secretary of Defense. Others were interested in Mrs. Rosenberg as the first woman to be recommended for a high defense post. The two friends, Gerald L. K. Smith and Benjamin Freedman, were less concerned with her sex than with her religion.

The two were joined, as Freedman later told a Senate committee, by common aims. They agreed on a common plan. When lunch was over, Freedman, the apostate Jew who had once arranged for shipments of machine guns to the Mufti, returned to New York. Smith, the old time anti-Semitic agitator and Fascist, went to work. Soon Smith telephoned Freedman to tell him that he was sending up two men who wanted the dirt on Anna Rosenberg. He implied, so Freedman testified, that they were official Senate investigators. When they arrived in the middle of the night, however, one identified himself as Don Surine, special investigator for Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY, the other, as Edward Nellor, leg man for Fulton Lewis, Jr.

After this meeting Freedman returned to Washington. From the office of Representative JOHN RANKIN he sent a letter to all Senators on the Armed Services Committee volunteering sworn affidavits to prove that Mrs. Anna Rosenberg was a former Communist and a member of the John Reed Club in New York during the thirties. At the same time Fulton Lewis, Jr., began a series of broadcasts predicting that the Rosenberg case would loom larger than the Hiss affair as proof of Communist infiltration in Washington.

The Senate Armed Services Committee had approved her appointment on November 29 after a brief hearing. But with the cries of Fulton Lewis, Jr., victor over their defeated Chairman MILLARD TYDINGS, ringing in their ears, the Senators rushed to reopen the case in a series of closed-door meetings arranged for Freedman and the "witnesses" he had sworn would back him up, which was to mean Ralph De Sola, a former fanatical Communist of Sephardic Jewish background, who had violently turned against his past.

Even before Freedman's initial appearance before the committee, the anti-Semitic press all over the country went into action with screaming headlines. The Jewish conspiracy became symbolized in Anna Rosenberg, who had come to this country from Hungary in 1912 and became one of our outstanding experts on labor relations. Leading the pack was Conde McGinley's Common Sense, which had been saved from bankruptcy by Freedman himself when McGinley earlier this year was hauled into a New Jersey court for resisting the execution of judgment for nonpayment of debts. Common Sense switched from headlines on Yiddish Marxists plot United States of America defeat by U. S. S. R. to shouting about Mrs. Rosenberg's coming from the heart of the Eastern European Yiddish population and alleging that she was guilty of repeated subversive activities in the thirties. Other hate sheets took the cue. The Newsletter, put out in Los Angeles by Robert H. Williams, who still holds a Reserve status in the Army Intelligence, devoted several issues to Mrs. Rosenberg. Forrest C. Sammons' West Virginia anti-Communist league dropped its promotion of the Protocols of Zion to join the campaign. So did the various front organizations of Gerald L. K. Smith who, in a letter to his backers, claimed sole credit for getting Mrs. Rosenberg.

Freedman's appearance before the Senate committee was no novel experience to him. In addition to testifying before Congress on his tie-up with the Committee for Constitutional Government, he has made frequent court appearances—their high point being a suit he brought against Bernard Baruch, Senator LEHMAN, and Thomas Watson, president of International Business Machines, for conspiring with Cardinal Spellman to keep him out of the Catholic Church. Freedman's star witness, Ralph De Sola, was also no newcomer to the witness stand. Testifying against his former Communist comrades has been one of his major activities since 1939, although his latest endeavors have been in the musical columns of the Freeman.

Ralph De Sola's testimony before the committee had consistency and harmony. With a zeal which caused Senator WAYNE MORSE, Republican of Oregon, who holds a master of arts in clinical psychiatry, to call him one of the most extreme paranoiacs I have ever seen, De Sola went to work.

"I, Ralph De Sola," he stated in an affidavit, submitted by Freedman, that paralleled his testimony, "solemnly swear and affirm that I was a member of the Communist Party of the United States of America. * * * I was recruited by James Magraw * * * in his company I met Anna Rosenberg and he advised me that this outstanding social worker was a party member, but like many important comrades was kept out of general activity that might expose her to enemies of the Communist Party."

Later, De Sola stated he was told to forget the names of "early party contacts such as Anna Rosenberg * * * as the Communist Party had most important work for these top comrades." De Sola added that he would provide witnesses who would corroborate his testimony. To substantiate his statements, clippings from the Daily Worker and other New York newspapers were introduced, which cited an Anna Rosenberg as having signed John Reed literature and at another time being arrested by New Jersey police in the course of a radical fracas.

The present New York postal directory lists 43 Mrs. Anna Rosenbergs in that city alone. Was the John Reed signer, Anna Rosenberg, the woman whose confirmation was now before the Senate? De Sola swore that she was, and superficial appearances seemed to bear out Fulton Lewis' anticipation of another "Hiss trial."

On the following day Mrs. Rosenberg left her Pentagon office, next door to Secretary Marshall's, to face her accuser. She flatly denied ever having seen him before, and later told newsmen, "I didn't believe anyone who has lived the way I have, who has worked the way I have, could be accused in such a way by a man who admits he was a Communist." Even unfriendly acquaintances of hers thought it unthinkable that a shrewd and ambitious woman who was then deputy director of Gen. Hugh Johnson's NRA, and looking ahead, would be indiscreet enough to engage in Communist activity.

But still it was Mrs. Rosenberg's word against his.

TYDINGS after all was packing his bags down the hall, and MCCARTHY'S aide was coaching the accusers. Chairman RUSSELL announced that the question of mistaken identity is not completely eliminated.

The next witness was Helen Winner, De Sola's ex-wife. Her main contribution was to give further background to Senator MORSE'S analysis of De Sola. He was, she said, completely unstable, and haunted by a mother complex which caused him to blame women, especially successful women, for his own shortcomings. Miss Winner reportedly asked the Chairman to keep her remarks secret as she feared reprisals by De Sola on herself and her children. She described him as a person who goes to great extremes for what he regards as noble reasons. As a former fervent Communist and feature editor of the Worker she had been with De Sola at many party gatherings, but she denied categorically that she had ever seen Mrs. Rosenberg at any of these.

This concluded the fourth day the committee had looked into the matter. When hearings resumed Monday Freedman stuck to his guns in further testimony before the committee. Senator MORSE'S statement that there "appeared to be some organized anti-Semitic forces" behind the attack on Mrs. Rosenberg was the first public hint of the real character of the locked-door proceedings. Some interesting links between Freedman and De Sola also came to the front. Most often mentioned was Hallan Richardson, former attorney for the Yorkville Nazi, Joe McWilliams. Richardson had been Freedman's attorney in the cases arising out of his support of the Mufti, and he had also been interested in yet another committee which De Sola helped organize to press a suit against the Metropolitan Opera Co., the American Broadcasting Co., and the Texas Oil Co. for their part in the production of Verdi's opera, Don Carlo, which De Sola's group branded as inciting revolution by musical means.

The test of Freedman's and De Sola's repeated accusations came on Tuesday when the committee heard J. B. Matthews, former investigator for the Un-American Activities Committee, deny the role Freedman had tried to assign him. He said that Freedman had been pestering him to testify because he had once stated that Theodore Kirkpatrick, publisher of Counter-Attack, had told him that according to William Harris, a former FBI informer, Anna Rosenberg was a Communist. Matthews, and all the others in the smear link, were to testify that the case was one of "mistaken identity."

The next witness was James Magraw, a rambunctious Irishman who had been De Sola's boss in the WPA writer's project during the late thirties. With not too much academic background, he had, in 1939, refused to give an immediate approval to a book on snakes that De Sola had prepared for publication. Disgruntled, De Sola quit and shortly afterwards testified against Magraw in a subsequent congressional investigation into communism in WPA. Magraw also testified that he had never seen Mrs. Rosenberg at functions cited by De Sola.

By now the case was crumbling so fast that there was a rush to leave the snake expert in the pit which he had dug. Fulton Lewis suddenly discovered that the attack on Mrs. Rosenberg had anti-Semitic connotations and evil sources and indignantly condemned those involved.

On Thursday the committee was called together once more to listen to yet another witness, George Starr, a former FBI man cited by De Sola. His testimony added to the long string of denials. That morning the committee also received another communication from Freedman. He now wanted to file some new testimony. Simultaneously he told the World-Telegram's Fred Woltman in New York that he was putting up $10,000 to clear the Mrs. Rosenberg and to help advertise for the "other woman" to come forward to clear her. "Otherwise," he declared, "this unfair charge will be hanging over her head. I think it is terrible. It's disgraceful that the FBI hasn't produced this other woman." The same day the committee passed on the nomination, 13 to 0.

NLRB Sabotages Taft-Hartley Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, in the current issue of the Saturday Evening Post there is an article entitled "And So I Was Purged," by Robert N. Denham, former counsel for the National Labor Relations Board, in collaboration with Stacey V. Jones. This article, in my opinion should be read by every Member of Congress because it is a fair statement of the manner in which the NLRB is sabotaging the Taft-Hartley Act and thereby defeating the will of Congress in its effort to create and maintain peace with justice for all in the field of labor-management relations.

"And So I Was Purged" gives ample basis for thorough congressional investigation of the NLRB and its apparent efforts to serve the interests of the labor racketeers, with the view of making the necessary changes in the law to make explicit the intent of Congress. The article follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of December 30, 1950]

AND SO I WAS PURGED

(By Robert N. Denham as told to Stacy V. Jones)

A few weeks before the recent congressional elections, I was summarily fired as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board. There is nothing remarkable about the mere removal of a Federal official; people in Government are fired for one reason or another, just as in business. But this case illustrates something important that the public ought to realize: although the President can't change a law passed by Congress, he can attain much the same end by changing the administrators.

My ejection was one move in the campaign that started a little over 3 years ago with the battle cry that resounded in the White House as well as in the halls of labor—repeal Taft-Hartley. If you can't win by a frontal assault, try flanking tactics. The direct attacks have all failed, but the danger now is that, although the law remains on the statute books, it will be completely nullified.

The week before the ax fell on me, President Truman and some 50 officials of the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations held a dinner behind closed doors at a Washington hotel. It was described as a simple little social gathering, with no political implications. Senator ROBERT A. TAFT, coauthor of the law, commented in an interview that the connection was obvious, and that my removal was the pay-off, another surrender to the CIO Political Action Committee. I have no doubt that it did seal the bargain exchanging my political head for the promise of votes—which did not materialize.

Union officials had been clamoring for my dismissal, both openly and privately, for years. Scarcely a month went by without such a demand from William Green or Philip Murray or one of their centurions. The complaint was never that I was not doing my duty, but that I was doing it too well.

There was an almost comic haste about my removal. In September, on my return from vacation, I was called to the White House and told that my resignation was desired. As a lawyer, I had always believed that the President had full authority to remove me at any time. I wrote the resignation with some care, making it effective at the President's convenience, because I knew that with the office vacant much of the enforcement work would stop. The President accepted it within a few hours, to take effect 2 days later. As my successor was not appointed for 10 days after I left, it was obvious that the hurry was not to get somebody else in, but to get me out.

I believe in the need of the Taft-Hartley Act, and I believe in enforcing it as Congress intended. Decisions and policy statements since my resignation indicate that neither the members of the Board nor the new General Counsel completely believes in either. It is always incongruous to assign people to administer a law who aren't for it.

The Taft-Hartley Act directly affects perhaps 13,000,000 or 14,000,000 union members and their employers. To the rest of the public it is probably only a name derived from those of its chief authors, Senator TAFT and Representative Fred A. Hartley, just as its predecessor, the Wagner Act, is popularly called after its sponsor, Senator Robert F. Wagner.

The Wagner Act was a simple law, passed in 1935, in the depths of the depression, for the frank purpose of helping the unions. The first section of the law declared it to be United States policy to encourage "the practice and procedure of collective bargaining" and to protect "the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing." The NLRB, which the act created, went into full partnership with the unions in a campaign to organize American industry.

The Board's job under the Wagner Act was to prevent "unfair labor practices" by employers which interfered with unionization or collective bargaining, and to supervise elections among employees held to pick unions as bargaining agents. There was no pretense of protecting employers against union skulduggery. It was a lopsided, prounion law. In the dozen years during which it stood unchanged, the unions became bloated with power and arrogant to the point of lawlessness. The public was increasingly injured and increasingly concerned by the abuses which the act encourages—the inroads of communism in labor unions, the picket-line violence, the goon squads that forced men into unions, willy-nilly, the refusal of unions to bargain on the same basis as employers, jurisdictional strikes, secondary boycotts, and featherbedding.

Under pressure from the people for correction of these excesses, the Taft-Hartley Act was passed in 1947. It kept virtually intact all the protection for the employees and unions against unfair labor practices by employers, but added very marked protection for the individual workers, management, and the public against unfair practices by unions. The new law forbade unions to coerce or restrain workers in their right to join or not to join unions or engage in union activity. It made them subject to prosecution by the NLRB and to damage suits by employers if they called strikes for certain purposes. And it forced them, before they could get any help from the NLRB, to open their books to the Government and to their own members, and forced their officers to swear they were not Communists.

Another Taft-Hartley reform was creation of the independent general counsel. Under the Wagner Act the Board had made the regulations, hired the investigators, appointed the lawyers to act as prosecutors, and then sat as judge and jury. Congress decided to separate the prosecuting and judicial functions in the American tradition of a fair trial. The general counsel was to be appointed by the President for 4 years, subject to Senate confirmation. He was to have supervision over all but a few of the NLRB lawyers, and over the officers and employees in the regional offices. He was given complete and final authority to investigate unfair labor practices, issue complaints, and prosecute them before the Board.

The Taft-Hartley machinery is roughly this: A union or an employer files a complaint of unfair labor practice in one of the 20 regional offices. If the case isn't settled informally, a trial examiner is sent from Washington to preside at a hearing. He makes a report, and if either the union or the employer objects to it, the case is reviewed by the Board in Washington. Then if either does not like the Board's decision, it may appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, and finally ask for review by the United States Supreme Court.

If the Board wants to enforce a decision it must apply to a United States Circuit Court of Appeals. For an injunction the general counsel applies to a United States district court.

Why I, of all people, should have been selected by the Fair Deal as the first general counsel I have never understood. I am a Republican. I had been a lawyer for nearly 40 years, and for the last 9 of those years I had been an NLRB trial examiner. I insisted on trying out various formulas under the Wagner Act to afford some relief to employers as well as to the unions, and in consequence I was in almost continuous conflict with the Board. I did not hesitate to dismiss union charges when I considered them groundless. Often the Board overruled me on the dismissals, but whenever such a case was appealed to court I was sustained.

In late June 1947 I told James J. Reynolds, Jr., the Board member who aproached me about the general counsel job, that I was not interested, that it would be a man-killer, and that I would prefer to live on in reasonable peace, with enough time for my family. But he persisted, the Board upanimously recommended me, and in a few days I was called to the White House. There Dr. John R. Steelman, the "Assistant President," told me the President wanted to appoint Republicans to two of the three vacancies created by the new law, and wanted me as one of the two because I had been in Government service for some years and knew the ropes. Dr. Steelman said that if I would stay with it a year or a year and a half and get things running, I would be relieved for less arduous duties.

To the two new places on the Board—which was increased from three to five—the President appointed Abe Murdock, a recently defeated Democratic Senator from Utah, for 5 years, and J. Copeland Gray, a Republican from Buffalo, N. Y., who had served on the Wage Stabilization Board, for the 2-year term.

When the President advised me of my appointment he told me, in the presence of the five Board members, that although he didn't like the act, he would expect me to administer it in accordance with its terms and the intent of Congress. He added that he wouldn't be telling me how to run my job. Incidentally, he didn't.

Things started off with deceptive smoothness in the late summer of 1947. There were certain inconsistencies and blank spaces in the law. To bridge these, I worked out an agreement allocating authority—between the Board and my office—with the two holdover Board members in Washington. The Chairman, Paul M. Herzog, was in a hospital in New York City. All the administrative and housekeeping authority formerly exercised by the Chairman was given to me, as my operations represented about 85 percent of the agency's activities.

This agreement proved to be particularly obnoxious to Chairman Herzog and became the basis of a long intramural fight, much of which has never before been publicly related. The Board spent much of its energy and time in the first half of 1950, for instance, on efforts to repudiate the agreement.

At the outset, in August 1947, the Board decided it needed a solicitor to advise it on matters of law. There was no provision for such a job, and the Board had no authority to appoint one, but at the members' insistence I assigned from my staff a solicitor and an assistant whom they specifically requested. The first solicitor resigned in about a year, and was succeeded by Ida Klaus, a niece of David Dubinsky, president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. Shortly after her accession the real trouble started.

When I moved in, the atmosphere of the entire agency was thoroughly Wagnerian. Under the earlier act, which many staff members had been administering for 10 or 12 years, labor was a sacred cow. Most of the staff had come in as crusaders for organized labor, and had never lost the fervor. An employer was regarded as guilty merely because he was an employer.

Under the allocation agreement, about 1,200 employees in Washington and throughout the country reported to me, and about 250 to the members of the Board. One of my first moves was to invite those on my staff who were unwilling to subscribe to Taft-Hartley to get out.

One reform I instituted early was abolition of an extraordinary contract with the union of NLRB employees, signed by the old Wagner Board, which provided that all promotions and changes had to be reported to the union and could be disputed if some union member felt he should have the job. I told the union that I would be glad to post notices of vacancies so that anyone interested could apply, but that jobs would be filled by me, as the responsible Government official, and that promotions would be made by me when and as indicated.

The first difference with the Board involved the Taft-Hartley requirement of non-Communist affidavits from officers of a union and from "the officers of any national or international labor organization of which it is an affiliate or constituent unit." By agreement with the same two hold-over Board members as to what the rule would be, I announced that officers of the A. F. of L. and CIO would have to sign. The air was at once filled with brickbats.

CIO officials protested that not a single CIO union could make use of the law because of the presence of Ben Gold, a Communist Party leader, among the CIO officers. A. F. of L. officials complained that none of their unions could use the NLRB machinery because of John L. Lewis, a vice president, who wasn't a Commie but was too stubborn to sign. My answer to both of them was, "Well, the only thing to do is to get rid of those fellows. That's what the law is for."

They didn't like that, and went to see members of the Board. A day or so later, one of the Board members called to advise me that he hadn't understood what we had agreed upon, and that he would have to withdraw from the agreement. The next day the second member came to say he had understood it thoroughly, but that he would have to pull out, too.

In a few weeks the first case involving the point came before the Board. With Gray, the only Republican, dissenting, it ruled that the A. F. of L. and CIO were not labor organizations, and consequently their officers did not have to sign. The Board has been reversed in two out of three such cases by the circuit court of appeals, and if the Supreme Court likewise overrules the Board, doubt will be cast on many NLRB decisions. These cases affect especially the CIO, which did not meet the requirements until December 1949.

Under the Wagner Act, cases sent up by the trial examiners were digested by a review section which recommended board action. The section had been built up by Nathan Witt and Thomas I. Emerson. Witt has twice refused, before the House Committee on Un-American Activities, to affirm or deny membership in the Communist Party, on the ground of self-incrimination, and has been named in testimony by Lee Pressman as having been a fellow member of a Washington Communist cell. Emerson, now a Yale professor, was identified in a report of the same committee as president in 1950 of the National Lawyers' Guild, which the committee called "the foremost legal bulwark of the Communist Party, its front organizations, and controlled unions."

Congress specifically abolished the review section in passing the Taft-Hartley law, but its personnel furnished more than half of the nearly 100 legal assistants, or law clerks, assigned to the Board members as their personal staffs. Thus, the review section personnel turned up as nuclei of what amounted to five little review sections, advising the individual Board members. These people—of whom 18 or 19 are assigned to each Board member—were the only attorneys in the agency exempted by law from reporting to me as general counsel.

There were three ways to kill Taft-Hartley, and all three were tried. First, there was the legislative. Herzog, who dominated the Board, had opposed Taft-Hartley when it was passed, and he supported two later efforts to abolish it legally. The second method was to make crippling decisions—continued interpretation of the law so as to restrict the employer on every count, but not to restrict the union, even at the expense of individual employees. The third was administrative maneuvering, of which my ouster was the crowning move.

Outright repeal was a leading issue in the 1948 presidential campaign, and was used for all it was worth in labor votes. The law had been passed over a Truman veto, and its revocation was a plank in the Democratic platform.

Two sore points with the union bosses were the prohibition of the closed shop—under which a man has to belong to a union before he can get a job—and the authorized use of injunctions to halt that and other specified union unfair practices. Both irked the International Typographical Union, against which we had obtained an injunction for violation of the closed-shop clause.

When the ITU convention that summer demanded that the President investigate Senator TAFT'S unwarranted interference with the executive branch—in inviting during my absence two of my assistants to his office to discuss the ITU case with Chicago publishers—I was called on the White House carpet.

Clark Clifford, then the President's special counsel, cross-examined me as prosecutor, with the President sitting as judge. The President asked me whether I didn't consider Senator TAFT'S action as unfair pressure. My answer was "No," and that we probably wouldn't have recognized it as pressure anyhow, because we were already preparing to do what the publishers wanted—start contempt proceedings against ITU officials. (Later the court found them in contempt.)

I could not help thinking how Harry S. Truman, as chairman of the Senate committee bearing his name, had put the heat on many an official only a few years before.

When the administration hailed the 1948 election as a mandate from the people to repeal Taft-Hartley, the majority board members went to work to help achieve this end. Chairman Herzog, who had been chafing under the loss of the administrative powers he had held in the Wagner days, was the most active.

One characteristic incident was blown up by the columnists into the battle of the bathroom. What happened was this: When the agency was preparing to move into new offices in January 1949, and we were discussing assignment of space, someone asked who was to get the corner office, which had a private shower. J. Copeland Gray, then a board member, remarks innocently to Herzog, "Paul, why don't you and Bob toss up a coin and see who gets it?"

Without a word, Herzog stalked out of the room. I learned later that he was furious that anybody but the chairman would be considered for it, and gave Gray a dressing down for even suggesting the possibility. As it turned out, I was assigned offices at the other end of the hall, and without my requesting it, a shower was also installed for me.

When House and Senate committee hearings were held by the new Democratic Congress, Chairman Herzog testified in favor of Taft-Hartley repeal, and particularly in favor of elimination of my job. The Republican minority in the Senate committee asked that I also be heard. I advocated amendments, but retention of the law as a whole, particularly the provision for an independent general counsel.

The mud flew thick, in and out of Congress. Some of the milder terms used by the unions were "Tuff-Heartless Act" and "Slave Labor Act." I have been called a lot of names myself, but nothing like these applied to me by Senator MATT NEELY, of West Virginia, who was incensed that I had dared use the injunction against unions. He compared my attitude toward the laboring man to that of the Emperor Caligula, "who wished that the Roman people had only one head, so that he could chop it off with a single blow." Borrowing he said, from Martin Luther, he also called me "a devil, a horrid calumniator, a wicked sycophant, a prince of darkness, a real Apollyon, a beast, a horrid imposter on mankind, one in whom there is scarcely any philosophy, and a goat."

Although moderate amendments could have been passed at the 1949 congressional session, the administration insisted on repeal, and got nothing.

The next frontal assault was the President's Executive order of last March, called plan 12, which was aimed openly at me. It would have abolished my job and transferred my administrative functions back to the chairman. The board unanimously supported the plan. Under the Reorganization Act, however, it could be blocked by either House, and the Senate vetoed it, 53 to 30.

Personal relationships in the agency naturally had become somewhat strained, and most communications between the board and me were on paper, but after plan 12 failed, a peace conference was held at my suggestion in the board's conference room, in an effort to work out a basis of operation. This resulted only in my listening to 2½ hours of vituperative criticism.

All pretense at bipartisanship had been dropped by then. The board was thoroughly packed with Fair Dealers. The term of Gray, the only Republican, was allowed to expire in December 1949 without any word to him from the White House as to whether he would be reappointed or replaced. To date, he has received not even a note of thanks from the White House for his 2 years' service. His successor, Paul L. Styles, a Democrat who had once been an ITU organizer, became rather openly labor's man on the board. I was the only responsible official still there who fully supported and defended Taft-Hartley, and I often felt like Horatius at the bridge.

It would seem elemental that the members of a quasi-judicial board should be experienced lawyers, yet in 15 years the NLRB has been pitifully devoid of lawyer members—and I mean lawyers with real courtroom experience, not just attorneys at law. Three of the five present members have been admitted to the bar, but only one has had any courtroom legal experience. He is Murdock, who was county attorney of Beaver County, Utah, and city attorney of Beaver for a total of about 10 years in the 1920's and early 1930's. (The 1930 population of Beaver County was 5,136 and of the city of Beaver 1,673.) Yet this is the board which has frequently undertaken to reverse the Federal courts as well as the general counsel.

NLRB procedure is slow, and while it's starting, grave damage may be done through labor-union practices which the law declares to be unfair. Taft-Hartley, therefore, authorizes the use of injunctions to halt such practices. Sometimes the general counsel has discretion in applying for an injunction, but in secondary-boycott cases the law directs him to act immediately if he has reason to believe such boycotting exists.

Suppose you run a bakery and have a dispute with your employees' union. Picketing of your bakery is permitted; but if the union pickets the people who buy your bread, that is secondary boycotting, and prohibited. If the NLRB general counsel can convince a Federal district judge of the violation, an injunction is issued. These injunctions are not issued lightly, but nevertheless the board has not hesitated to throw out such cases and in effect reverse the judges.

My staff got an injunction against a union that was picketing an upstate New York trucking concern in an attempt to stop it from doing business with another trucking concern with which the union had a dispute. The board threw out the case on the ground that the employer, by belonging to an employers' trucking association, had waived his right to protection from this prohibited secondary boycott. Yet within a month the same board decided that any attempt by a union to waive any of its rights was against public policy and would not be permitted."

In another injunction case, the decision was a masterpiece. Trucks belonging to a small concern with headquarters in New Jersey, and with union employees, were picketed by members of the New York teamsters' local when they made deliveries in New York City, to induce the men on the loading platforms not to handle the goods until members of the New York local were hired by the New Jersey concern. A Federal judge agreed that this was a secondary boycott. But the board said in effect that the trucks were to be regarded as the concern's place of business—not just the headquarters in New Jersey—and that it was all right to picket the trucks wherever they were found.

Many such cockeyed decisions have been reversed when carried to the Circuit Courts of Appeals. Thank God for the courts, but the little fellows like the New Jersey trucker can't afford to appeal. In his case the union, encouraged by the board, drove him out of business within a few months. Until such a case is reviewed and decided by a court, the board's decision governs the handling of similar cases. In a sense, this is legislation.

One inexcusable policy of the board has been its refusal to let small businessmen, their workers and their unions enjoy the benefits of Taft-Hartley. Congress had given me, as general counsel, the final authority to determine whether a case should be prosecuted, but the board took the stand that it didn't have to hear a case unless it wanted to. It was overburdened, and could take only the big ones. This policy has thrown hundreds of cases back into the jungle warfare that obtained before the Wagner Act.

It is the job of the general counsel to present a case when the board applies to a Circuit Court of Appeals to get a decision enforced. Several such cases forced me to act against my basic principles, to defend the indefensible, to stultify myself, and to make the agency ridiculous. I suggested that to insure a presentation fully supporting the board's views, its solicitor present such cases. The board, obviously either to humiliate me or to prove it was boss, insisted that I present them, and I complied. Once I was ordered to defend a decision which criticized me. In another case, the board ordered me to tell the Court of Appeals that both I and the district judge in the same circuit who had issued an injunction had been wrong, and the board had been right.

Frequently the Board tried to dictate to me how to write the briefs which it was my job to file to get the enforcement orders. One such effort brought an exchange of memoranda last summer, whose bitterness was probably without precedent in any Federal agency. It was a paper war, fought up and down the long corridor that separated our offices. I returned shot for shot, and gave no ground. At stake was the basic principle laid down by Congress, of separation of the judge and prosecutor functions in the agency.

The Board ordered me flatly not to file a brief prepared under my direction, but to use an earlier draft prepared by one of my law clerks, which I had seen. It was bad law, and I refused, reminding the Board that under Taft-Hartley I had charge of the legal department. The Board found parts of my reply offensive and complained that I had given hidden instructions to my subordinates. To my own subordinates. I called the Board's attention to its own improper conduct in trying to instruct my subordinates. In one memorandum I suggested that the Board members were being intentionally misled by their legal advisers.

After I filed the brief, the Board's solicitor filed with the court a motion to throw out my brief and substitute another. This I vigorously resisted.

When the Board members and their allies in organized labor discovered that I couldn't be pushed around and wouldn't quit, Chairman Herzog demanded from the White House more concrete support, and evidently it was promised. The Board then undertook to remove some of my powers, by amending the 1947 agreement allocating authority. For example, the Board wanted control of the top personnel in the field offices. That could not be taken directly, for under the law it was exclusively my responsibility. But the Board succeeded by seizing the purse strings—taking over the payroll and other administrative sections at headquarters in Washington, and blocking my appointments.

By this time I was convinced that much of the Board's lack of success in court, and much of its cross-purpose conflict with my office, arose from the legal advice it was receiving from its solicitor, Ida Klaus, so I ordered her recalled. This brought an insulting letter from the Acting Chairman, John M. Houston, saying I had no right to cancel her assignment, and that she had been directed to ignore the order.

When I left on vacation last summer I delivered at the White House an olive branch in letter form. It suggested that the Board drop its attempts to shackle me, and that I transfer to it my staff of about 25 enforcement attorneys. That would have permitted the Board to present its decisions to the courts as it liked, without asking me to support positions which in conscience I could not. I understand that the letter was discussed with Chairman Herzog, but that nothing less than my head would satisfy him. It was on the day I returned from vacation that I was notified I was through.

My successor, George J. Bott, is a Fair Deal Democrat, who was one of my assistants. His published statements indicate that he will do nothing to prevent the Board from turning Taft-Hartley back into Wagner. He has already surrendered much of his independence. He has agreed, for one thing, to withdraw the disputed brief mentioned earlier and file the one the Board insisted on. He has also given up his designation of top personnel in the field, and his right to determine whether to apply for discretionary injunctions.

I lost the battle, but I surrendered nothing. What happened to me as an individual is of little consequence. I merely returned to the private practice of law sooner than I had expected. But what happens to the country is important.

One of our most important Government agencies, exercising wide influence over a large segment of our economy, has been captured by a crew who apparently intend to operate it without heed to the orders of Congress—to substitute government by men for government by laws. The Taft-Hartley Act is being interpreted by a Board which my experience leads me to believe is too partisan to give it fair application. And the Board's subjugation of the general counsel has removed the counterweight which Congress provided.

For the present the only remedy the country has lies in the courts. I am convinced that a real solution requires not only amendments to the law that will make explicit the intent of Congress but replacement of the entire Board, the general counsel and key officials with persons who believe in the act and are capable of applying it.

No Good Word for Tito

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, December 26, 1950

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include the following article appearing in the January 6 issue of America, national Catholic weekly, entitled "No Good Word for Tito:"

NO GOOD WORD FOR TITO

(By Edward Duff)

"Frankly, no bill that has come out of the Foreign Affairs Committee or before the House has been supported with as little enthusiasm as the measure before us today." Representative A. A. RIBICOFF, Democrat, Connecticut, was describing H. R. 9853, a bill to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia, a measure that his committee had reported out. From the Republican side of the House, Representative H. R. GROSS, Iowa, taunted:

"Virtually every speaker in behalf of this measure has prefaced his or her remarks with an apology and attempted disclaimer for supporting Tito, an avowed Communist and the head of a government as dictatorial, ruthless, and brutal as there is in existence on this earth today."

In the Senate Chamber TOM CONNALLY, Democrat, Texas, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, opened debate on S. 4232 with the dauntless spirit of the Lone Star State:

"If any Senator 2 years ago had suggested that I would today be standing on the floor of the United States Senate advocating $38,000,000 for aid to Communist Yugoslavia, I should have called him to order."

There was no good word for Tito in the discussion of emergency relief for Yugoslavia that opened in the Senate on December 7, and in the House on December 12. The relief bill was passed and sent to the President for his signature on December 19.

Repeatedly describing the measure as a gamble, the Congress decided to hedge its bet that aid to Tito would strengthen America's national defense. Interesting conditions were attached to the gift of food to the people of Yugoslavia. Indeed, Yugoslavia was required to agree to some guaranties before the assistance granted was made available to her. She was required:

1. To provide us with local currency needed for American administrative expenses of the program.

2. "To give full and continuous publicity through the press, radio, and all other available media in Yugoslavia to the assistance furnished by the United States," and more important, to allow us access to such media.

3. To allow us to observe and supervise the distribution by Yugoslavia of the food we are giving. The House report mentioned 12 or 13 American observers, a palpably insufficient number.)

4. To distribute our and all other available food "without discrimination as to race or political or religious belief."

5. To bank local funds to the value of our gift of food "to provide relief to needy persons and to children and for charitable, medical, and such other purposes as may be mutually agreed upon." This is the counterpart funds arrangement in all ECA grants.

6. "To take all appropriate economic measures to reduce its relief needs, to encourage increased production and distribution of foodstuffs within Yugoslavia and to lessen the danger of similar future emergencies." Representative WALTER H. JUDD (Republican, Minnesota) is responsible for this amendment calling on Tito to stop exporting food in a frenzied effort to industrialize his country and to cease forcing collectivization on Yugoslavia's peasants. Said Congressman JUDD:

"When our Government is advocating land reform and wider distribution in many countries and is urging family-owned and operated farms here in the United States, it ought not be helping Tito in exactly the opposite direction in Yugoslavia."

In an effort to make it clear that we are aiding the people of Yugoslavia, not their Communist bosses, another amendment, sponsored by Senator BRIEN MCMAHON, Democrat, of Connecticut, was attached:

"Nothing in this act shall be interpreted as endorsing measures undertaken by the present Government of Yugoslavia which suppress or destroy religious, political, and economic liberty, and the Yugoslav Government shall be so notified when aid is furnished under this act."

Stringent sanctions were written into the Emergency Relief Assistance to Yugoslavia Act. Every 3 months the Secretary of State is to make a full and detailed report to Congress providing information on whether Yugoslavia is fulfilling the six congressional conditions and what developments are noted "in the attitude of Yugoslavia with respect to basic human rights." The President—or Congress by concurrent resolution—is empowered to terminate all assistance promptly, should it become clear that Yugoslavia is not living up to her agreement or should "changed conditions make the continuance of assistance unnecessary or undesirable or no longer consistent with the national interest or the foreign policy of the United States."

Strengthening America's national defense was the overriding consideration in the minds of the Congressmen. Representative JACOB K. JAVITS, Republican, of New York, spoke of the aid as "economic warfare." We should spend the money to have "a Communist backfire burning in Yugoslavia," Senator TOM CONNALLY urged. Our gift of food will, it was argued, cost us nothing really, since the money will be taken from appropriated but unexpended Marshall plan funds, according to an amendment of Senator PAT MCCARRAN, Democrat, of Nevada. Though the administration had asked for $38,000,000, Senator MCCARRAN rephrased the request to read "not in excess of $50,000,000" to legalize the $12,200,000 already given by ECA under dubious authority.

Our national interest, it was felt, demanded that we support the heresy that had erupted inside international communism, that we should encourage Tito's nose-thumbing at Stalin. It was assumed that the break between Tito and the Kremlin was sincere, complete, and irreparable. It was argued that to have 32 Yugoslav divisions stationed on the Soviet flank was a deterrent to aggression well worth the price—less than one-third the cost of equipping and maintaining an American division for 1 year. The suggestion that our bribe might buy only an immobilized Yugoslav army in the case of a bypassing Soviet invasion of Western Europe was not taken too seriously. It was understood that the Yugoslav army would certainly fight if the country was invaded. Our military leaders, headed by Generals Marshall and Bradley, seemed not too fearful we would be barred from the Adriatic by Tito. They endorsed the aid bill, obviously preferring to have Tito rather than Stalin in Belgrade.

How well the much-publicized 32 divisions of the Yugoslav army would or could fight was disputed. Representative MICHAEL FEIGHAN (Democrat, Ohio) reminded Congress that Hitler crushed a Yugoslav army of impressive numbers in 1 week in 1941. Tito's forces, armed with captured German and Italian equipment and cast-off Soviet matériel, is manifestly no match for the motorized armies of the satellites. Moreover, the morale of the army, which is composed mainly of peasants, reflects the people's hatred of the Communist regime. Representative WAYNE L. HAYS (Democrat, Ohio) could claim to have first-hand information on the point. Our military attaché in Belgrade had assured him that he (HAYS) was the only American who had seen the Yugoslav Army on maneuvers. "Ragtag, bobtailed, ill equipped, poorly clad fighting units," was Mr. HAYS' judgment. In case of invasion they would "murder their officers, take to the hills and fight against Tito and the Communists from without and try to set up an independent government in Yugoslavia." Congressman FEIGHAN argued that we should send a military mission to get the facts that concern our national interest so crucially.

WHY THE NEED?

How real is Yugoslavia's need? Representative CHARLES W. VURSELL (Democrat, Illinois) and others pointed out that $421,000,000 of our money has been poured into that country since the outbreak of World War II. Representative JAMES C. DAVIS (Democrat, Georgia) asked the Library of Congress Legislative Service to check. The report on UNRRA relief (American contribution: 72 percent) declared: "Yugoslavia has received as a gift goods equal in sales value to more than 10 years of its total prewar national budget and to three full years of its gross national income." The report asserted that one-third of the Yugoslav Government's revenue came from the sale of UNRRA supplies in 1946. Since the food given by us to the people of Yugoslavia is to be sold by Tito's regime through regular commercial (nationalized) outlets, Congressmen could well have shown more interest in the prices the Government will fix and the use of ration cards to penalize the antisocial, i. e., democratic, elements.

According to American experts the food shortages due to the drought vary in different parts of Yugoslavia. The grain production for the whole country amounts to 71 percent of the 1947–49 average. How much of the shortage is due to the drought and how much to Tito's policy? John J. Haggerty, the agricultural attaché at our Belgrade

Embassy, estimated that 10 or 15 percent of the fall in production was explained by general economic deterioration and apathy, and the rest due to the drought. Mr. FEIGHAN asserted that food production under Tito had never reached 60 percent of the prewar totals. The Ohio Congressman explained that the regime had dragged a million young peasants from the farms to work in state-owned factories, and pushed collectivization of agriculture in a frenzied effort to prove Tito a better Communist than Stalin. "According to September 1950 figures from the Yugoslav agricultural commission," asserted Congressman FEIGHAN, "there are now 6,970 kolkhozes—collective farms—in Titoland. The vast majority of them—5,650—have been created in the past 2 years, or since Tito fell out with his fellow thieves in the Kremlin." The report of the House Committee on Foreign Relations conceded euphemistically: "Production on privately owned farms is not as low as that on collective farms."

The debate served to spotlight the monstrous tyranny triumphant in Titoland. There was a full airing of the police-state methods of a regime run on terror and maintaining itself by denial of freedom of speech, freedom of elections, freedom of religion. A Congressman told his colleagues of meeting an old lady in Serbia last year whose husband had been visited by Tito's secret police seeking to know why he had not contributed more grain. Before he had a chance to answer, they shot him down in front of his grandchildren. Senator HERBERT R. O'CONOR (Democrat, Maryland) reported that the aged aunt and uncle of one of his constituents were jailed for 30 days because they were unable to furnish the Government with their quota of grain. The memory of our fliers ruthlessly shot down when off their course over Yugoslavia was recalled. The fate of the 11,000 kidnaped Greek children was brought up. Tito has returned only 60 or 70, it was asserted. Representative WAYNE HAYS described a scene he witnessed in a Yugoslav school where milk provided free by the UN International Emergency Fund was being distributed. The children were obliged first to sing a song: "Thanks to our great leader Tito for this milk we get today." Will the children have to sing the same song for their supper supplied by American food, three-quarters of which will come from our CCC surplus stocks? Tito's hostility to the free world was recalled. Yugoslavia's was the lone vote to the Security Council on June 27 against the resolution to repel aggression in Korea. As late as June 1 of this year Tito's Ambassador to Washington, Vladimir Popovitch, labeled American foreign policy imperialistic.

RELIGIOUS OPPRESSION

Tito's relentless oppression of religion was spread on the record, particularly by Representatives JOHN J. ROONEY, Democrat, of New York; ANTHONY F. TAURIELLO, Democrat, of New York; and MICHAEL FEIGHAN, Democrat, of Ohio. In addition to his persecution of Catholics, Tito was indicted for his imprisonment of American-born Orthodox Bishop Varnava Nastic, of Sarajevo, and his signal for the bombing of Belgrade on Easter Sunday morning 1945, just as the Serbs were coming out of their churches. State Department reports of a relaxation of religious persecution in Titoland today are mythical.

The Emergency Relief to Yugoslavia Act was passed in the interests of our national defense. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reveals that the Catholic War Veterans of America, the Catholic Economic Association, Bishop John F. O'Hara, of Buffalo, and Bishop John Burke, his auxiliary, supported the measure. They took pretty much the same position America has advocated, as expressed by Representative WALTER JUDD: "Whatever weakens the conspiracy that threatens the survival of the United States helps us."

Congressman BOYD TACKETT, Democrat, of Arkansas, opposing the bill, confessed himself "at a loss to know the battle cry for world war III." In the debate the day before he had heard the reminder of the occasion in 1943 when the House rafters rang with cheers for Mihailovitch. Perhaps the international situation is getting less ideological—to use a Churchill expression of 1944. Perhaps that is why the State Department told the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House that it wanted no strings or conditions attached to the aid bill—though we are not chary about conditions on aid to the Philippines. Perhaps that is why much of the congressional debate, derogatory to Tito, would never be allowed to be broadcast to Yugoslavia over the Voice of America.

Rights, Privileges, and Benefits for Veterans and Their Dependents Provided by the Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD, I am giving a résumé of legislation enacted during the Eighty-first Congress for the benefit of veterans and their dependents.

The Eighty-first Congress has removed inequities in and liberalized existing laws pertaining to veterans and their dependents to meet present-day conditions, and in many instances has provided original legislation for this purpose. There follows a brief outline of some of the most important legislation on this subject.

COMPENSATION AND PENSIONS

Legislation was enacted to remove the discrimination which existed against a veteran, without dependents, who had recovered his competency after having been hospitalized, or cared for by the Veterans' Administration, so that he will receive, at the expiration of 6 months following a finding of competency, the amount of benefits withheld during the period of such care by reason of a limitation precluding payment to him because of his estate amounting to $1,500 or more—Public Law No. 194, Eighty-first Congress, approved August 1, 1949.

The Congress felt the distinction between these two classes of veterans, that is, a competent veteran discharged from hospitalization, and one that was incompetent but restored to competency following hospitalization, to be unwarranted and that the economic needs of the veteran who has regained his competency were as great as and often more urgent than the needs of the other veterans.

As a general principle established by Congress, compensation or pension is authorized effective from date of discharge or date of death only, provided claim for such benefit is filed within 1 year from such date of discharge or date of death; otherwise it is paid from date of claim. An exception to this rule was provided in a law permitting back payment of compensation or pension in the case of any claimant on the rolls, from the date giving rise to a claim with respect to the disability, death, or attainment of a certain age of a member of the Armed Forces of World War II who could not file such claim earlier because of enemy action. Claim for benefits under the new act must have been filed within 1 year from date of enactment of the law, that is before August 1, 1950—Public Law No. 195, Eighty-first Congress, approved August 1, 1949.

Then there was passed in the first session of the Eighty-first Congress a law that is commonly called an omnibus law because it contains a number of different benefit provisions in one act. It provides that compensation shall be paid at the full 100 percent rate in certain World War I cases which were granted compensation by presumptive service-connection and paid only at 75 percent of the full rate. This act also made more liberal the law and the regulations with reference to payment of compensation for service-connected arrested tuberculosis by providing a total rating for 2 years following the date of arrest and a 50 percent rating for an additional period of 4 years instead of the previous ratings of 100 percent for 6 months following arrest and a 50 percent rating for 4½ years thereafter. These statutory ratings are available to peacetime and wartime veterans. The monthly rates of compensation, however, for peacetime cases are equivalent to 80 percent of the wartime rates.

This omnibus law increased the basic per centum rates of compensation for veterans having service-connected disabilities by approximately 8.7 percent, the new wartime rates ranging from $15 per month for a 10 percent disability to $150 per month for a total disability—prior rates ranged from $13.80 to $138—and the peacetime service rates automatically were increased to 80 percent of the new wartime rates, making the new peacetime rates range from $12 to $120 per month—prior rates ranged from $11.04 to $110.40.

This law increased the wartime rates of service-connected death compensation for a widow with children to allow $105 a month for a widow with one child, plus $25 for each additional child, in lieu of the prior rates of $100 payable to a widow with one child plus $15 for each additional child. Corresponding peacetime rates of death compensation were increased to $84 for a widow with one child, plus $20 for each additional child—prior corresponding rates were $80 and $12.

In the Eightieth Congress, there was enacted a law providing additional compensation to war and peacetime veterans, with dependents, and who were 60 percent or more disabled from service-connected disability, largely on the theory that disability of that degree would seriously handicap a veteran in obtaining and following suitable gainful employment to enable him to support himself and his dependents. The omnibus law previously referred to extended this benefit to veterans who are at least 50 percent so disabled—Public Law 339, Eighty-first Congress, approved October 10, 1949, and Public Law 436, Eighty-first Congress, approved October 29, 1949.

Another law enacted in the Eighty-first Congress extended from 1 to 3 years the statutory presumptive period for service-connection of pulmonary tuberculosis by providing that if the disease develops to a 10 percent or more degree of disability within 3 years from the date of release from active service, it shall be deemed to have been incurred in or aggravated by active service, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary. This law applies to wartime veterans for service-connected compensation purposes and it served to place World War II veterans more nearly on a parity with the presumption accorded under earlier laws for World War I veterans for this disease—Public Law 573, Eighty-first Congress, approved June 23, 1950.

INSURANCE

A law was passed to make it clear that national service life insurance, which becomes payable by reason of death of the insured on or after August 1, 1946, in any case in which a beneficiary, not entitled to a lump-sum settlement, survives the insured and dies before receiving all the benefits due and payable, the commuted value of the remaining unpaid installments—whether accrued or not—shall be paid in one sum to the estate of the insured and not to the estate of the beneficiary. This law was enacted to clarify the provisions of the National Service Life Insurance Act, as amended—Public Law 69, Eighty-first Congress, approved May 23, 1949.

HOUSING LEGISLATION

World War I and II veterans, or their families, are given preference for admission to low-rent public-housing projects by an amendment to the United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended. This amendment provides preference in the following order: First, service-connected disabled veterans; second, families of deceased veterans and servicemen whose deaths were service-connected; and, third, families of other veterans and servicemen. This amendatory act also provides a preference to veterans of any war, or their families, regardless of service connection, in the granting of loans for construction or repair of farm homes. It is required, however, that such veteran shall have been discharged or released from service under conditions other than dishonorable. This law also provides certain aid to State low-rent or veterans' housing projects—Public Law 171, Eighty-first Congress, approved July 15, 1949.

Another law enacted in the Eighty-first Congress, increased by approximately $500,000,000 the amount of the authorization to the Federal National Mortgage Association for the purchase of certain home loan mortgages insured by the Federal Housing Administration or guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, as amended.

In the Eightieth Congress special housing assistance was accorded certain seriously service-connected disabled veterans in the nature of a contribution by the Government of not more than 50 percent of the cost of a home and not in excess of $10,000 with which to buy or build a new home, or to remodel an existing home for their requirements. That act was amended in the Eighty-first Congress so as to extend its benefits to veterans entitled to compensation, under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, for permanent and total service-connected disability due to the loss, or loss of use, by reason of amputation, ankylosis, progressive muscular dystrophies, or paralysis, of both lower extremities, such as to preclude locomotion without the aid of braces, crutches, canes, or a wheel chair—Public Law 286, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 7, 1949.

Another housing act authorizes the purchase by the Federal National Mortgage Association of any mortgage guaranteed, after October 25, 1949—the date of the act—by the Veterans' Administration under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act in an original principal amount not exceeding $10,000 per dwelling unit. It also increased to two and one-half billions the amount of commitments, investments, loans, and purchases which the Association may have outstanding at any one time. This, in effect, creates a 100-percent Government secondary market for Veterans' Administration guaranteed first-mortgage loans to finance the purchase or construction by veterans of low- and medium-priced homes. It represents a decided liberalization of this secondary market for guaranteed loans, which before this act restricted the sale by any lender to 50 percent of his eligible Veterans' Administration and Federal Housing Administration loans—Public Law 387, Eighty-first Congress, approved October 25, 1949.

One of the housing acts passed makes more liberal the loan provisions under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, as amended, in that it, first, extends the loan benefits of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act to the unmarried widows of deceased persons who met the service requirements of the act and died as the result of a service-connected disability; second, provides for the renewal of the guaranty or insurance entitlement initially used for any loan where the security has been taken by a Government agency for public use or has been destroyed by natural hazard or has been disposed of for other reasons not the fault of the veteran; third, extends the permissible period of a home loan from 25 to 30 years; fourth, authorizes the guaranty of loans made by the States on an automatic basis; fifth, increases the amount of guaranty from 50 to 60 percent—but not to exceed $7,500—on loans for the purchase of residential property or construction of a home, provided the veteran has not previously availed himself of the loan benefits of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act; sixth, permits the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to guarantee a loan for a farmhouse secured by a first lien on a portion of the farm suitable in size and location as an independent home site—including use of the proceeds of the loan to secure the release of such site from any existing lien—and he is also permitted to exempt a farm-housing loan from the first-lien requirement of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act; seventh, requires conformity with minimum construction requirements prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in connection with loans on residential property on which construction is begun after 60 days from enactment; eighth, repeals the secondary-loan provisions of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act effective December 1, 1950, or such earlier time as the Administrator may determine after considering specified factors, but saving prior guaranties and commitments; and, ninth, authorizes, with limitations, direct 4-percent home or farmhouse loans by the Veterans' Administration where the veteran has been unable, otherwise, to obtain a 4-percent loan for which he is qualified under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, the total amount of each direct loan not to exceed $10,000 and such direct lending authority to expire June 30, 1951—Public Law 475, Eighty-first Congress, approved April 20, 1950.

The provisions for preference or priority to veterans of World War II or their families, in the purchase or rental of specified housing accommodations was extended to June 30, 1951—unless terminated earlier by Presidential proclamation—in still another law enacted in the Eighty-first Congress—Public Law 574, Eighty-first Congress, approved June 23, 1950.

The Defense Production Act of 1950 authorizes the President to reduce maximum principal amounts, maturities, and the ratio of loan to the value or cost of any type of housing loan in which any agency of the Government participates if he finds such action necessary after considering the effect of such loan on the public industry, the national economy, and defense production. A proviso requiring the retention of a relative preference for veterans is included in the act—Public Law 774, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 8, 1950.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Legislation was passed by the Congress December 18, 1950, having for its purpose the granting of vocational rehabilitation to those veterans disabled as a result of injury or disease incurred in or aggravated by active military or naval service on or after June 27, 1950, and prior to such date as shall thereafter be determined by Presidential proclamation or concurrent resolution of the Congress, who are entitled to compensation at the wartime rates, and who are in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of such disability. This benefit is similar to that granted for World War II veterans. The President recommended legislation of this nature to the Congress under date of December 4, 1950—House Document 728, Eighty-first Congress. The bill was approved by the President and became Public Law 894, Eighty-first Congress, December 28, 1950.

EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Certain changes in the education and training provisions of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act were enacted in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1950 in the first sessions of the Eighty-first Congress—Public Law 266, Eighty-first Congress, approved August 24, 1949—but these changes, being temporary limitations and subject to administrative regulations, were incorporated, with significant modification in a later act of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. This later act relates to the qualifications of schools and courses offered by schools, the character of courses, and the conditions under which they may be pursued by eligible veterans, and the determination of fair and reasonable rates of tuition chargeable by institutions. It also includes certain entirely new provisions, notably minimum standards for application by the States in approving profit schools, and a procedure for recovering overpayments of subsistence allowance from schools failing to make prompt reports of attendance status of veteran trainees—Public Law 610, Eighty-first Congress, approved July 13, 1950.

The purpose of another measure passed in the Eighty-first Congress is to preclude the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the adjustment of tuition rates under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, from reducing the estimated costs of teaching personnel by reason of Federal funds received under the amendments to the Morrill Act and applied by land-grant colleges to teaching costs. This law also contains provisions which prior to its enactment were practiced administratively, namely, to prevent the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in the case of any nonprofit educational institution from reducing the amount of tuition in the computation of teaching costs by reason of State or municipal or other non-Federal funds or private endowment or gifts or other income from nonprofit sources received by such institutions—Public Law 571, Eighty-first Congress, approved June 23, 1950.

AUTOMOBILES FOR AMPUTEES

Public Law 798, Eighty-first Congress, authorizes an appropriation of $800,000 for the furnishing of automobiles for World War II veterans entitled to compensation for the loss, or loss of use, of one or both legs at or above the ankle; and extends to June 30, 1951, the time in which to apply for eligible veterans who have not received the benefit. This law also permits the Government to pay not to exceed $1,600 on the purchase price of a vehicle even though the total price may exceed that amount—Public Law 798, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 21, 1950.

The Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1951, appropriated additional funds for automobiles and other conveyances for disabled veterans in the amount of $375,000—Public Law 843, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 27, 1950.

SOCIAL SECURITY

A law was enacted in the Eighty-first Congress amending the Social Security Act to provide a wage credit to World War II veterans under the old age and survivors insurance program of $160 for each month spent in the armed services between September 16, 1940, and July 24, 1947, both dates inclusive. Such wage credits would not be provided if a larger benefit or payment would be available without them, or if a benefit based, in whole or in part, upon the active military or naval service of such veteran during World War II is payable by any other agency or wholly owned instrumentality of the United States, other than the Veterans' Administration. The special 3-year survivor protection for World War II veterans is continued, but would not apply if, first, a larger benefit or payment would be available without it; second, pension or compensation is payable by the Veterans' Administration because of the veteran's death: third, the veteran died in service; or, fourth, he was discharged or released from military or naval service after July 26, 1951—Public Law 734, Eighty-first Congress, approved August 28, 1950.

FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT PREFERENCE

One enactment on the subject of preference in Federal employment grants such preference to an additional class of mothers of veterans not previously covered by law. It provides this right to a mother of a deceased or totally disabled veteran, who has remarried, provided she is divorced or legally separated from her husband, or such husband is dead at the time preference is claimed—Public Law 269, Eighty-first Congress, approved August 26, 1949.

HOMESTEADING PROVISIONS

Loan assistance under the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act and the Water Facilities Act to persons who acquire farms by means of homestead entry on public lands or who purchase farms on reclamation projects is provided in a measure passed in the Eighty-first Congress. It authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans on the security of a mortgage contract creating a lien against the land, rather than on the security of the usual real estate mortgage which was the previous requirement. This requirement was unworkable because these types of farmers were prevented from obtaining such loans in view of the requirement in the law that the loans were to be secured by a mortgage on the land to which they did not have title at time of entry or purchase. Title would be given only after certain period of occupancy and use. Veterans are the only ones who will become eligible for such loans on reclamation project lands within the next few years because of veterans' preference for the limited number of available units—Public Law 361, Eighty-first Congress, approved October 19, 1949.

RETIREMENT PAY

The Career Compensation Act provides that all duties, powers, and functions incident to payment of disability retirement pay, hospitalization, and reexaminations of certain members or former members of the uniformed services, shall be vested in the heads of service departments or in the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs under regulations promulgated by the President. Under this act and the regulations effective July 1, 1950, payment of disability retirement pay generally, with limited exceptions, of members and former members of the uniformed services is vested in the heads of the service departments. Pursuant to an Executive order issued by the President under this act, all responsibility for hospitalization of members or former members of the uniformed services permanently retired for physical disability or receiving disability retirement pay, who require hospitalization for specific chronic diseases, is vested in the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, effective May 1, 1950. However, responsibility for the hospitalization of such persons, for the mentioned chronic diseases, who have been admitted to hospitals under the jurisdiction of the uniformed services before May 1, 1950, may be exercised by the heads of the service departments until October 1, 1950—Public Law 351, Eighty-first Congress, approved October 12, 1949.

At the time of the passage of the Career Compensation Act some officers were in hospitals for various reasons which might lead to retirement. They were allowed a grace period until April 1, 1950, during which time they could elect to retire under the provisions of the retirement laws existing prior to the passage of the act. This period of time was extended to January 1, 1951, under an amendatory act—Public Law 511, Eighty-first Congress, approved May 10, 1950.

WAIVER OF BENEFITS

Provision is made in the National Military Establishment Appropriation Act for 1950 for the availability of funds appropriated for pay, allowances, or travel of any member of the Reserve or National Guard organizations of the Department of the Army and the Air Force, or a member of the Naval Reserve or Marine Corps Reserve in connection with periods of duty rendered pursuant to applicable law, if the person waives his disability compensation, pension, or retirement pay for the period in question, and if his disability is of such a degree as not to prevent acceptance for active Federal duty—Public Law 434, Eighty-first Congress, approved October 29, 1949. These waiver provisions were extended for a period of 5 years in a later enactment—Public Law 844, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 27, 1950.

MISCELLANEOUS BENEFITS

Legislation was enacted to provide for the extension of the term of certain patents of persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during World War II—Public Law 598, Eighty-first Congress, approved June 30, 1950.

There was enacted a measure granting protection against unlawful use of the badge, medal, emblem, and other insignia of auxiliaries to veterans' organizations—Public Law 661, Eighty-first Congress, approved August 4, 1950.

Provision was made for free mailing privileges for members of the Armed Forces of the United States on active duty in Korea or in such other areas as the President of the United States may designate as combat zones or theaters of military operations—Public Law 609, Eighty-first Congress, approved July 12, 1950.

Another enactment provides for an extension until June 30, 1956, of the current $500 payment per annum by the Federal Government to State or Territorial homes for the support of each disabled soldier or sailor of the United States cared for therein—Public Law 823, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 23, 1950.

A law was passed amending the Armed Forces Leave Act to extend until June 30, 1951, the time within which application may be made for terminal-leave pay—Public Law 479, Eighty-first Congress, approved April 26, 1950.

The Dependents Assistance Act of 1950 provides allowances for dependents of enlisted members of the uniformed services—Public Law 771, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 8, 1950.

One of the laws confers upon veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer Rebellion and the Philippine Insurrection, suffering from non-service-connected disabilities the same rights to out-patient treatment as are available to war veterans suffering from service-connected disabilities—Public Law 791, Eighty-first Congress, approved September 19, 1950.

In addition, the following measures were passed by the House and were pending in the Senate at the end of the session.

I am reentering them in the hope that we may secure their final passage in the early days of the coming session.

BILLS PASSED BY HOUSE AND PENDING IN SENATE

H. R. 1941: Excludes from the terms "parent," "father," or "mother" under National Service Life Insurance Act any parent who shall have deserted his family for a period of 7 years and who shall remain in such desertion at the time insurance matured—reported in House January 24, 1950; House Report No. 1510; passed House February 6; pending in Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 2108: Amends the so-called Dependency Allowance Act to provide that dependent husbands of female veterans may be listed as dependents in order for the veteran to receive additional compensation where the veteran is 50 percent or more disabled—reported May 5; House Report No. 511; passed House May 16, 1949; pending in Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 4617: Provides pensions for World Wars I and II veterans. A sectional analysis follows:

Section 1: Any veteran meeting service requirements and income limits less than 55 years of age who has a single disability of 60 percent or more, or two or more disabilities, one of which is 40 percent or more, making a combined rating of 70 percent or more, and who is unemployable, shall be entitled to $60 a month pension. The same rate applies to a man aged 55 who has disability of 60 percent or more, single or combined, and upon reaching age 60, the disability requirement is reduced to 50 percent. Note: The benefits applying below age 65 are now provided by VA regulation known as extension 5 of the 1945 Disability Rating Schedule. At age 65, the veteran would be presumed to be permanently and totally disabled without a medical examination, and regardless of unemployability, would receive a pension of $72 per month.

Section 2: Provides rate of $100 in lieu of the $60 and $72 rates mentioned above for those veterans who are so helpless or blind as to need the regular aid and attendance of another person.

Section 3: Raises the annual income limitation for a veteran without dependents from the present $1,000 to $1,200. The $2,500 limit for veterans who have dependents is left unchanged.

Section 4: Raises the annual income limitation for widows without children from the present $1,000 to $1,200. The $2,500 limitation for widows who have children is left unchanged.

Section 5: Bars benefits under the provisions of this act to anyone belonging to an organization which seeks to overthrow the Government by force or violence—hearings March 29, 30, 31, April 5, 6, 7, 8, 12, 13, 16, 26, 27, 28; reported May 12, 1949; House Report No. 580; passed House June 1, 1949; now pending in Senate Finance Committee.

Note: The original pension bill, H. R. 2681, which was recommitted to the committee on March 24, 1949, by a vote of 208 to 207, provided the following: $90 per month pension for World War I and II veterans on reaching age 65; aid and attendance rate of $120 in lieu of $90 for those helpless or blind; raised the income limitations for widows from $1,000 to $2,000 if without children from $2,500 to $3,000 if with children; placed World War II widows on same basis as World War I widows for purpose of receiving pension.

H. R. 5833: Building trades training under GI bill of rights. Permits work on live projects with full institutional subsistence rates provided training given veterans is on public school property—hearings July 14, 19, 26, 27, 28, August 2, 3, 4; reported by House August 24; House Report No. 1314; passed House August 25, 1949; pending before Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee.

H. R. 5965: Provides for the construction of veterans' hospitals involving 16,000 beds. Projects to be altered and changed as follows:

(Hearings by subcommittee Feb. 8, 1950; reported in House Feb. 28; H. Rept. No. 1719; passed House Mar. 6; pending before Senate Finance Committee.)

H. R. 6559: Establishes a floor of $60 a month for veterans of all wars and peacetime who have service-connected tuberculosis and have reached a condition of complete arrest—previously, rate applied only to World War I veterans—reported in House January 25, 1950; House Report No. 1536; passed House February 6; pending before Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 6560: To increase the monthly disability benefits upon payment of additional premium from the present maximum of $50 per month to $100 per month under the National Service Life Insurance Act—hearings by subcommittee March 14, 15, 16, and 17, 1950; reported in House May 9, 1950; House Report No. 2022; passed House July 17, 1950; pending before Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 6561: Provides uniformity in Veterans' Administration laws by requiring that the terms "wife" and "dependent" shall include dependent husband, and the term "widow" shall include widower whenever his condition is such that if the wife were living he would be dependent upon her for support—reported in House January 25, 1950; House Report No. 1537; passed House April 3, 1950; pending before Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 6562: Establishes a statutory award rate of $42 per month independent of other compensation for the loss, or loss of the use, of a creative organ—applicable to veterans of all wars and peacetime—present rate of $30 a month applied only to World War I veterans—reported in House January 25, 1950; House Report No. 1538; passed House February 20; pending before Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 6673: Provides treble damages against any seller of property guaranteed under the GI bill of rights, who receives a "side payment" above the price determined by Veterans' Administration appraisers—reported in House January 25, 1950; House Report No. 1539; passed House February 6, 1950; pending before Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee.

H. R. 7534: To create a presumption of service-connection to January 1, 1950, for any World War II veteran who developed the disease of psychosis—reported in House May 10, 1950; House Report No. 2030; passed House June 5, 1950; pending before Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 7739: To place on a parity with World War II veterans those veterans who served as cadets and midshipmen in West Point, Annapolis, and the Coast Guard Academy during World War I and the Spanish War—reported in House May 9, 1950; House Report No. 2023; passed House May 15; pending before Senate Finance Committee.

H. R. 8236: Permits the accumulation of dividends in the National Service Life Insurance fund on any dividends payable after January 1, 1951, unless veteran requests payment of dividends in cash—hearings by subcommittee on H. Appropriations, Second Session, Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, as is customary at the conclusion of a session, I submit a summary of budget estimates and action thereon in the appropriation measures considered and adopted during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. Only five appropriation bills were considered during the entire session, including two supplemental bills primarily for defense items, but not counting the District of Columbia bill which is not a charge on the general revenues.

Budget estimates for appropriations in these bills totaled $74,242,325,361, which were reduced by $1,972,985,794; amounts enacted totaled $72,269,339,567.

Estimates for contractual authority and loan authorizations totaled $3,000,-204,500, against which $3,183,935,000 was approved for these categories of obligational availability. In addition, provision for an over-all cut of not less than $550,000,000 was included in the omnibus appropriation bill, and since this figure was a minimum rather than a fixed sum, total reductions against estimates for all items aggregate not less than $2,339,255,-294.

There follows a tabulation summarizing the amounts in comparative form:

Comparison of budget estimates, appropriations, and authorizations, 2d sess., 81st Cong.

Unveiling Ceremony in Honor of the Honorable Brent Spence, Chairman, and the Honorable Jesse P. Wolcott, Former Chairman, House Committee on Banking and Currency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. PERCY PRIEST
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I desire to include a transcript of the ceremony incident to the unveiling of portraits of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE], chairman, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT], former chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

This ceremony, under the direction of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE], took place in the committee room on December 12, and a full report of the ceremony follows:

[From the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, December 12, 1950]

Mr. DEANE. The members of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives are appreciative of the fact that you, distinguished Representatives of the Departments, our friends and the ladies, are present with us on this happy occasion.

We are here, as you know, to honor two of the beloved and highly esteemed members of our committee, the gentlemen who sit at the head of the table.

Before I proceed, I would like to read a communication:

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 11, 1950.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN DEANE: I am glad to hear that two more pictures are to be added tomorrow to the notable collection of leaders who have served their country in the House of Representatives.

It is particularly appropriate that the likenesses of Messrs. BRENT SPENCE, of Kentucky, and JESSE P. WOLCOTT, of Michigan, chairman and former chairman, respectively, of the great Committee on Banking and Currency, should be unveiled at one ceremony.

The duties which they are discharging in these critical times are of superlative importance.

Please extend my hearty felicitations and warmest personal greetings to all who gather for the presentation exercises.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

[Applause.]

Let me repeat, we are indeed happy to have representatives from the White House and the key departmental agencies that from time to time appear before this committee of the Congress.

This is no time to attempt to eulogize these two young men whom we honor today—I think it will suffice to say that those who now serve and have served with them on this committee love and respect them.

Their careers in the Congress run almost parallel, and for that reason it seems altogether appropriate that the committee should choose to honor them jointly. My colleagues who you recognize around the table and in the well, namely: BROWN, of Georgia; PATMAN, of Texas; MONRONEY, of Oklahoma; HAYS, of Arkansas; RAINS, of Alabama; BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania; MULTER, of New York; O'BRIEN, of Michigan; WOODHOUSE, of Connecticut; MCKINNON, of California; ADDONIZIO, of New Jersey; DOLLINGER, of New York; O'HARA, of Illinois; BOLLING, of Missouri; GAMBLE, of New York; SMITH, of Ohio; KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania; TALLE, of Iowa; MCMILLEN, of Illinois; KILBURN, of New York; COLE, of Kansas; HULL, of Wisconsin; SCOTT, of Pennsylvania; NICHOLSON, of Massachusetts; and whose generosity made possible the pictures soon to be unveiled have delegated to me the very pleasant task of formally presenting the pictures.

The members of the committee requested the gentleman from New York [Mr. KILBURN], and me to arrange with a gifted portrait photographer, Mr. Robert Shoaf, to make the pictures of our chairman and former chairman. We feel that Mr. Shoaf has truly brought out the splendid qualities and peculiar characteristics of our two friends.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] were elected in November 1930. In those days we had the lame-duck session of Congress, and it was not until March 1931 that the gentleman from the Fifth District of Kentucky and from the Seventh District of Michigan enter the United States House of Representatives. Since that time their constituents have kept them on the job constantly. Both BRENT and JESSE sought and were given assignment to the Committee on Banking and Currency and in that special emergency session of the Seventy-third Congress called by President Roosevelt in March 1933 they cut their eye teeth on the Emergency Banking Act of 1933. Since those crucial days up to this time the record will show that under the leadership of these men some of the most far-reaching legislation ever reported from a congressional committee and later enacted into law came from the House Committee on Banking and Currency. You, our guests today, the guardians and stewards of that legislation, can best confirm.

Unlike other major committees of the House we do not work in subcommittees. I think that is one of the reasons that the legislation reported from this committee has been so universally accepted by the House of Representatives.

Our chairman and our former chairman have ridden herd, and at the same time, by virtue of their wise counsel and their shrewd leadership, I feel—and I am sure I speak for my colleagues on the committee—and likewise for you who are guests, so many of whom are the guardians and stewards of the legislation that has been reported from this committee, represents perhaps the most outstanding legislation enacted by the Congress.

And now, Mr. Chairman, may I ask you and Jesse to please stand. [Prolonged applause.]

While these men continue to stand, I would like to say that our committee operates smoothly and efficiently because of another reason—we have an unsurpassed staff. At this time I am asking two charming members of our staff, Miss Helen Long and Mrs. Margaret Battle, to now attempt to wade through the shrubbery here in front and unveil the pictures of the men we are pleased to honor. [Prolonged applause.]

It is a great honor to have in our gathering this afternoon the Speaker of the House and the majority and minority leaders, and at this time I recognize our beloved speaker, Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. DEANE, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ex-Chairman, any time I can refer to a Republican as "Ex" I am pleased; I am happy to be here.

I never thought that I would live to see the day when I would see JESSE WOLCOTT unveiled. [Laughter.]

Apparently it was a very kindly photographer. [Laughter.]

Of course, there is a feud between WOLCOTT and me, and there has been for a long time; he thinks he is a fisherman and I don't; but we made pretty good friends out in a neighborhood where things were wet as water. [Laughter.]

I am happy to be here to pay my respects to these two very distinguished gentlemen: BRENT SPENCE is, in my opinion, one of the most lovable characters that I have ever known, and one of the ablest and best chairmen of a great committee that it has been my privilege to know, and that is a great concession, because I, too, was at one time momentarily a chairman of a great committee. [Laughter.]

When the committee is under his leadership, I feel pretty safe about what comes out of it.

And in the 2 years that Mr. WOLCOTT, my well-beloved friend, was chairman of this committee, I knew that the legislation that came out of the committee would be well-considered legislation, and when he or BRENT SPENCE, either one, present a bill to the House of Representatives you may know that they know what is in the bill, and that is the reason we are willing to follow them almost unanimously on most measures.

I congratulate you both for being members of a great committee such as this, and especially for having been fortunate enough to be chairmen of such a great committee. [Applause.]

Mr. DEANE. It is likewise a great honor to have with us the minority leader, Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. DEANE, Speaker RAYBURN, Majority Leader MCCORMACK, members of the committee, and friends of our two distinguished guests of the afternoon, this has really become quite a bipartisan meeting, one that is full of contentment and the fullest amity.

I am glad to pay honor to these two gentlemen who have served for more than 20 years as Members of the Congress and of this great committee. Both are Members for whom I have the highest admiration and respect.

We differ politically frequently on the great issues confronting the country; that is natural, it is human, and it is desirable, because out of the controversy and discussion and debate come compromises and amendments, and, finally, legislation that is in the genuine interest of the people of the country.

We are, as I say, divided in many instances on political questions, but there is one place where we are not divided; and that is, all of us here are for one single purpose, and that is to make our country a better land in which to live.

I am happy to come here and pay my tribute to these two outstanding legislators—men who for the last 20 years have devoted their time and talents in helping in the solution of many grave economic problems. America is a great country, and has great problems, and what we do in a large measure determines not only the future of our country but the future of the world.

We are very fortunate in having two patriotic Americans like BRENT SPENCE and JESSE WOLCOTT in charge of the destinies of this Committee on Banking and Currency which handles so many of our intricate problems.

I look at these two pictures, the one of the gentleman from Kentucky, sedate and serious, like the great statesman that he is, and at that of our beloved friend of Michigan, a little bit roguish, a little bit with an air of "What's coming next." You know we Republicans always have to wonder about that. [Laughter.]

We are not always benefited by the knowledge of what will come next in our life. [Laughter.]

But these are very fine pictures and, I hope, portraits that will be here for many years, not only as an honor and a tribute to two great Americans, but as an inspiration to all others who come to this committee, that they might serve as patriotically and wisely as they have.

Thank you. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. DEANE. Our majority leader, Mr. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCORMACK. Congressman DEANE, Speaker RAYBURN, and—once a Speaker always a Speaker—Speaker MARTIN, members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen, and friends of the two special guests of the occasion. Like the speakers who have preceded me, I am very glad to be here. I think the best evidence of the deep respect and admiration, as well as the strong friendship that is entertained for and toward Chairman SPENCE and Chairman WOLCOTT, is the very fact that there is such a fine gathering of ladies and gentlemen here today.

I am sure that after this brief ceremony is over both of these gentlemen will always remember the presence of you who are here today, most of you not only officials of various agencies of the Federal Government, but each and every one of you here because of the deep respect that you hold for both of these distinguished legislators and fine gentlemen.

I have served with both of them for the past 20 years, as have SAM RAYBURN and JOE MARTIN. There are many things that all of us could say about them, and every word would be true.

Both of them have been honorable and trustworthy public officials, men in whom the people of their districts have shown their pride and confidence in by repeated reelection, and the people of their respective districts have not erred in their good judgment.

Coming here as new Members, as we all do when we are first elected, they have advanced and advanced, so that not only today but for the past dozen years or so each of them has occupied positions of leadership and prominence in the House of Representatives.

Elected to this committee many years ago, as each of them was, by their respective parties in the House, they have advanced to the time when they each became chairman. Both of them discharged their duties as members of the committee with fidelity, with honor, and with ability. They both discharged their duties as chairmen of the committee in the same way.

I repeat, the very presence today of representatives of the various agencies whose legislation came before this committee is the best evidence of the deep respect in which they are held.

The person who brought about these pictures certainly has brought out a very fine likeness of both of them. Both are splendid reproductions of our dear friends, BRENT SPENCE and JESSE WOLCOTT, and they fittingly occupy a place in this great committee room alongside that of another great chairman, Henry Steagall, of Alabama, who was chairman of this committee for many years, and whom many of us in the room today remember as one of the ablest and most effective Members of the House ever to serve, and one of the outstanding chairmen of any committee that has ever served in either branch of the Congress during our constitutional history.

I am very glad to be here to join with all of you in honoring these two fine gentlemen, these two outstanding legislators. [Applause.]

Mr. DEANE. There is certainly likely to be, in the mind of the chairman, a tinge of sadness in the fact that his beloved companion slipped away around a year ago, and is unable to participate in this program this afternoon.

I understand that Mrs. Wolcott is present, and I would like her to rise and be recognized at this time. [Applause.]

This concludes our program. I thank you.

Natural Gas for New England

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS J. LANE
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include herein a letter I have received from Mr. W. C. Norman, president of the Northeastern Gas Transmission Co., of Springfield, Mass.:

NORTHEASTERN GAS TRANSMISSION CO.,
Springfield, Mass., December 27, 1950.
The Honorable THOMAS J. LANE,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LANE: During the many months that the project to bring natural gas to New England has been pending, I know that you have expressed much interest in seeing natural gas become a reality for this industrially important region.

I am writing to you now because of this interest in natural gas on your part. My purpose is twofold: to report to you the progress we have made since the Federal Power Commission issued a certificate to Northeastern Gas Transmission Co. to build a New England pipeline, and to suggest how you might be of further assistance in bringing the full benefits of natural gas to the gas consumers of New England and your district.

But first, I might reemphasize something you already know—that most legislators have gone on record as having said, in effect, that they favor whatever applicant pipeline company that can get natural gas into New England quickest, cheapest, and best.

Now, about our progress.

The Federal Power Commission issued us a certificate to build a New England pipeline on November 8, 1950. Immediately upon the issuance of this certificate, we placed 10 survey crews in the field, and as of December 31, 1950, we will have completed the survey of the greatest part of the main lines we are authorized to build. Some pipe has already been delivered and all the pipe required for 1951 construction will have been delivered before summer. Pipe will be going into the earth as soon as the snow is off the ground in the spring.

Northeastern will be bringing gas to nearly all the areas of New England it has been authorized to serve before the winter of 1951. This is certainly proof that we are doing all in our power to meet the requirements of getting gas here quickest.

What have we done about providing the cheapest and best gas service?

In meeting these requirements we can best follow the recommendations of the Federal Power Commission in its opinion No. 202. In this opinion the Commission said:

"It is still our opinion, based upon analysis of the economic characteristics and needs of the region, as shown by this record, that the public interest would best be served through fully coordinated facilities free to secure gas from whatever sources of supply are best able to meet the large ultimate demands of New England for natural gas upon the most favorable terms and conditions."

Here, certainly, is the Commission's definition of what is cheapest and best.

In attempting to measure up to this definition, we filed on December 21, an application with the Federal Power Commission, a copy of which is enclosed. The petition, as you will see, proposes by a minimum of investment, to make natural gas available to the entire New England market.

It measures up to the yardstick of getting gas to New England cheapest and best by eliminating an extensive and needless duplication of facilities that would result from the construction of two overlapping lines. The application involves a total investment of about $38,000,000. For only $10,475,000 additional cost we can serve every town which Algonquin proposes to serve at a cost of $30,477,800. If two duplicating lines are built in New England the cost would be about $58,000,000. The consumer would be saddled, through higher rates, with the difference in the resulting costs of duplicated investment, personnel, operating expenses, and taxes. This, in our opinion, is certainly proof that we can get gas here cheapest.

Upon examination of the map, included as part of the enclosed application, you will see that we are in a position to serve the entire New England market with construction of only a relatively minor additional amount of pipeline.

Meeting the requirement of bringing natural gas to New England in the best manner involves several factors. Many areas of New England, as things now stand, have not been certified by the Federal Power Commission for service by us, although we have been willing to serve them. The other pipeline contender, Algonquin Gas Transmission Co., has never wanted to serve many of these areas. Certainly no part of New England where a genuine market exists should be without the benefits of natural gas.

If our application pending before the Federal Power Commission is approved, we can assure these areas of natural gas. But more than that, we can get natural gas to them at least a year sooner than any other pipeline company could. By only minor extensions to our lines, we could bring gas service to many important industrial areas which otherwise may wait until the winter of 1952 or even the winter of 1953 before getting gas.

It is impossible to place too much emphasis upon this need for early service. The demand for fuel and power will increase steadily as our machines of production begin to hum. With natural gas available a year earlier, an important contribution will have been made to the mobilization of New England's strategically important industrial centers for the production of defense armament.

The measurement of best service involves something else important. Because of the seriousness of the international situation, every pound of steel available will be needed for building the weapons of defense. If we are permitted to construct our single, integrated pipeline, 51,000 tons of steel will be saved—for that is the amount that would be required by duplicating and overlapping pipelines.

We believe we have done everything possible to meet squarely the yardstick of getting natural gas to New England quickest, cheapest, and best. We know we have followed the belief of the Federal Power Commission as to the most efficient means of serving the vital New England market.

Because of your past and present interest in bringing natural gas to New England, I have written you this rather lengthy letter.

As you know, the Federal Power Commission, in reaching its final decisions, uses the measurement of public convenience and necessity. It would be most helpful—it would assist in getting natural gas here quickest, cheapest, and best—if you would advise the Federal Power Commission of your desire that New England gas consumers receive the fullest benefits of an adequate supply of natural gas at the lowest possible rates, and if you would follow the progress of our application as it affects your own constituents and all the people of New England.

Respectfully yours,
W. C. NORMAN, President.

Guard the Constitution

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN BELL WILLIAMS
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, December 22, 1950

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in this era the United States and all nations are menaced by collectivist trends. In order for Americans to understand and appreciate the inherent evils of this trend, we should more thoroughly acquaint ourselves with the Constitution of the United States, which is the best plan ever devised to assure freedom and liberty to a people. The Constitution is our guarantee that life, liberty, and property shall remain safe and free as long as the form of government contained therein shall survive.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution is not outmoded nor does it stand in the way of progress as some social and political experts would have us believe. It is based on the wisdom and knowledge of law as expounded by great men from the time of Moses down through Blackstone and Jefferson and it shall endure as long as time itself. With these thoughts in mind, I commend to my colleagues the following article taken from the January issue of Coronet magazine:

GUARD THE CONSTITUTION
(By William LaVarre)

Americans are plagued today by various political groups that want to change the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution, these groups insist, is outmoded, and must be amended before we can go forward into a bigger and better life. With persuasive arguments, they seek to convince us that a little change here and there would improve and streamline the Constitution.

But what is the truth? The truth is that the Constitution of the United States is a great Gibraltar of human integrity, peace, and freedom, effectively blocking those who would enslave us from achieving their ultimate goals.

As we travel the world, we see constant proof that nowhere else in today's civilization does there exist a Nation as great and powerful as the United States. No other country enjoys our luxuries of strength, wealth, freedom, prosperity, and security. Across the seas, other powers have suffered political and economic defeat; many have become captive nations. How did it happen that the United States, beginning in a primitive wilderness, grew so strong, wealthy, and secure, while so many other nations began to wither and die? Was it just good luck?

The Chinese have an old proverb which says that the success of the longest journey begins with the first step. Our long journey as a nation began with a first step that was both slow and laborious—the creation of a constitutional government for welding 13 individualistic States into a strong humanitarian union. Our first step was taken by the American patriots who wrote out and pledged allegiance to an agreed-upon document that history has proven to be a colossal monument to human wisdom.

The secret of America's strength today lies in the miracle that began 163 years ago, when—on September 17, 1787—delegates to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia signed the first step in our national journey—the Constitution.

"We, the people"—

We, the people of the United States—for a century and a half and in a world of constant antagonisms—have grown into more perfect union, established justice, insured domestic tranquility, provided for the common defense, promoted the general welfare, and secured the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. Strength came to us from a strong Constitution, which, like a block of hardest stone, adamantly refused to permit itself to be chipped to pieces, generation after generation.

Had the people of the United States been easily persuaded to amend the Constitution, we would be a very different country today. We would, for instance, have a President who served for life. Decisions of the Supreme Court could be overruled by popular vote. Ministers of the Gospel would be prohibited from holding public office. The President could veto State laws. In fact, States would have been abolished and the Republic divided into four bureaucratic "districts," ruled from Washington. These changes were incorporated in amendments that were proposed and campaigned for by minority cliques in the past.

Some 4,250 attempts have been made to change the Constitution. Many of them were bitterly disputed by past generations of citizens. Looking back on the proposals now, some seem suicidal and many just plain silly. But, at the time, they all attracted aggressive missionaries and spokesmen.

The wisdom of the early American statesmen who sought a foolproof formula to guarantee a growing nation liberty and prosperity is evident today in the fact that—in all 163 years—only 11 actual amendments have been ratified. Twenty-one amendments have been added to the original 1787 text, but 10 were part of the Bill of Rights proposed by the First Congress and are generally considered to be an integral part of the original Constitution. Of the 11 amendments adopted, most of them gave more freedom, more rights, and more responsibilities to the American people.

Realizing that no human document could be perfect, the framers of the Constitution included in the text itself provisions for amending it. But they wisely created a procedure so deliberate that no amendment could be put over by a small, organized group or rushed through on a wave of popular sentiment.

Article V prescribes the two methods of amendment. If two-thirds of the Members of both Houses of Congress consider it necessary, the Congress may take the initiative. Should legislatures of two-thirds of the States request it, Congress calls a constitutional convention to propose the amendment. But in either case, ratification by legislatures or special conventions of three-fourths of the States must be obtained before the amendment becomes part of the Constitution. This is a nation of United States, and the people of three-fourths of them—large or small, rich or poor—have the right to ratify the proposal before it becomes law.

Under the Constitution, the Supreme Court is the official guardian and interpreter of the document. Had the Constitution not contained within itself provision for such a supreme authority to protect the rights and freedoms it proclaimed, we might today be in no better position than the people of other nations that once boasted fine-sounding constitutions.

We Americans have only to look abroad to see how precious the rights and freedoms guaranteed us by our Constitution are in this unhappy world of 1951. We enjoy freedom of religion, speech, press, and peaceful assembly. We are protected from unreasonable searches and seizures, from excessive bail and fines, from cruel and unusual punishment, and from involuntary servitude.

Under the Constitution we still have the right—now lost to millions of other people—to petition the Government for redress of grievances, to writs of habeas corpus (which half the human world no longer enjoys) and to swift and public jury trials where we may confront our accusers and make them prove their charges. And all Americans have an equal voice in electing our public servants; the worker's vote is as powerful as that cast by his boss.

We, the people of the United States, are still free. We have preserved not only the inherited words but the living laws of our Constitution. Just as long as we are vigilant against those who would mislead us into surrendering our national heritage, just that long will we continue to be a free and powerful America.

As Thomas Jefferson said, "When we find our Constitution insufficient to secure the happiness of our people, we set it right." But how rarely have we found it necessary to add an amendment. Thus, as we protect our Constitution, so will our Nation endow us with more power and freedom as individuals. Today, as always in the past, America's Constitution remains the world's most enlightened and magnificent political document.

Veterans' Legislation Enacted by the Second Session of the Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a compilation entitled "Veterans' Legislation Enacted by the Second Session of the Eighty-first Congress."

This brings up to date a similar list inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 16, pages A6661—A6663.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VETERANS' LEGISLATION ENACTED BY THE SECOND SESSION OF THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

Public Law 453, approved March 10, 1950: Provides for the utilization of surplus Army Department-owned real property at Fort Logan, Colo., as a national cemetery for burial of members of the Armed Forces dying in service or former members whose last discharge therefrom was honorable.

Public Law 456, approved March 10, 1950: Amends the act establishing a Department of Medicine and Surgery in the Veterans' Administration, approved January 3, 1946, as amended, to extend the period for which employees may be detailed for training and research to 280 days in a year. This is for the purpose of increasing their professional knowledge or technical training in fields of medical education, research and related sciences, etc., or their proficiency in medical administrative techniques and which will materially contribute to the medical care and treatment of veterans.

Public Law 468, approved March 27, 1950: Urgent Deficiency Appropriation Act—appropriated an additional $720,000,000 for readjustment benefits, to remain available until expended.

Public Law 473, approved April 17, 1950: Authorizes the extension of officers' retirement benefits to certain persons who, while serving as enlisted men in the Army of the United States during World War II, were given battlefield promotions to officer grade and were incapacitated for active service as a result of enemy action.

Public Law 475, approved April 20, 1950: Amends the National Housing Act, as amended, to: (1) liberalize, extend and expand FHA insurance authority under titles I, II, and VI; (2) increase the purchasing authority of the Federal National Mortgage Association and remove its power to make advance commitments for the purchase of eligible mortgages; (3) provide for the disposal of war and veterans' housing (Lanham Act housing), and (4) authorize low-interest-rate loans by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to educational institutions to provide housing for their students and faculties. Amends title III of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, as amended, among things: to extend GI-loan benefits to unremarried widows of certain deceased veterans; to extend permissible period of a home loan from 25 to 30 years; to increase amount of guaranty from 50 to 60 percent on loans for purchase of residential property or construction of a home, provided the veteran has not previously availed himself of title III benefits; and to require conformity with minimum construction requirements prescribed by the Administrator for loans on residential property. Repeals the secondary loan provisions (sec. 505 (a)) of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, and provides 4-percent loans to veterans under certain conditions.

Public Law 479, approved April 26, 1950: Provides an extension of the time for making application for terminal leave pay. Amends section 5 of the Armed Forces Leave Act of 1946 (37 U. S. C., sec. 34) by striking out "September 1, 1948" wherever it appears in such section and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1951."

Public Law 487, approved April 28, 1950: Authorizes the Joe Graham Post, No. 119, American Legion, upon certain conditions, to lease the lands conveyed to it by the act of June 15, 1933 (lands within the Ship Island Military Reservation in the State of Mississippi).

Public Law 492, approved April 29, 1950: Amends the act of July 31, 1946, in order retroactively to advance in grade, time in grade, and compensation certain employees in the postal-field service who are veterans of World War II.

Public Law 501, approved May 3, 1950: Extends the time limits for the award of certain decorations. Any decoration, heretofore authorized by the act of Congress to be awarded to any person for any act or service performed while on active duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, or while serving with such forces, may be awarded at any time not later than 2 years subsequent to the date of the approval of this act for any act or service that was performed between December 7, 1941, and September 2, 1945, provided that the written recommendation for the award be made not later than 1 year subsequent to the date of approval of this act.

Public Law 546, approved June 14, 1950: Continues until June 30, 1954, the authority of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to establish and maintain regional offices, etc., in the Republic of the Philippines.

Public Law 571, approved June 23, 1950: Amends Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a) by providing that under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act no reduction be made in the computation of estimated costs of teaching personnel and supplies for instruction in any land-grant colleges because of land-grant funds received from the Federal Government. Also provides that no reduction shall be made on account of payments to nonprofit educational institutions from State funds, etc.

Public Law 573, approved July 23, 1950: Provides that active pulmonary tuberculosis developing a 10 percent disability or more within 3 years from the date of separation from actual service shall, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, be deemed to have been incurred in active service.

Public Law 586, approved June 30, 1950: Amends laws relating to the Military Academy and extends to the Air Force the provisions that 40 cadets shall be nominated from among the sons of World War I and II veterans who have died from service-connected injury or disease.

Public Law 598, approved June 30, 1950: Provides for the extension of the terms of certain patents of persons who served in the military or naval forces of the United States during World War II.

Public Law 599, approved June 30, 1950: Extends, until July 9, 1951, the Selective Service Act of 1948, which provides that veterans of World War II shall not be liable for induction for training and service until a declaration of war or national emergency made by the Congress.

Public Law 610, approved July 11, 1950, Veterans' Education and Training Amendments Act—Restricts the authority of the Veterans' Administrator with respect to selection of courses under the Servicemen's Readjustment Act, so as to insure the veteran the right to select a course provided it is not avocational or recreational and is in the same general field of the veteran's occupational objective.

Creates a Veterans' Education Appeals Board to hear complaints of educational institutions.

Public Law 611, approved July 15, 1950: Authorizes revision of procedures presently employed by the Veterans' Administration in the administration of personal funds of patients and funds due incompetent beneficiaries.

Public Law 661, approved August 4, 1950: Extends the law prohibiting the unlawful wearing, etc., of badges, medals, etc., of veterans' organizations chartered by Congress, to recognized auxiliaries of such organizations.

Public Law 734, August 28, 1950: Social Security Act amendments—Gives World War II veterans wage credits under the old-age and survivors insurance program of $160 per month for the time spent in military service between September 16, 1940, and July 24, 1947, unless credited under some other Federal retirement system.

Public Law 779, approved September 9, 1950: Establishes priorities for special induction into the military service, as follows: (1) Persons who received special training and education and who have had less than 90 days of active duty, (2) persons who received special training, etc., and had more than 90 days and less than 21 months of active duty, (3) persons who did not have active service subsequent to September 16, 1940, and (4) persons not included in (1) and (2), who have had active duty since September 16, 1940.

Public Law 791, passed over President's veto September 19, 1950: Provides for outpatient treatment by the Veterans' Administration for veterans for the Spanish-American War, etc., in non-service-connected disease or disability cases.

Public Law 798, approved September 21, 1950: Authorizes $800,000 to provide automobiles at $1,600 appropriately equipped for World War II veterans entitled to compensation for loss of one or both legs.

Public Law 823, approved September 23, 1950: Extends from June 30, 1951, to June 30, 1956, the payment of Federal aid to State or Territorial homes for disabled soldiers and sailors (amending act of May 18, 1948; 62 Stat. 237).

Public Law 827, approved September 23, 1950: Authorizes the release of the trustees of Columbia University and the Citizens' Veterans Homes Association of Rockland County, Inc., under the contract for the operation of the veterans' temporary housing project known as Skanks Village in Rockland County, N. Y.

Public Law 843, approved September 27, 1950: Supplemental Appropriation Act—appropriated an additional $375,000 for automobiles and other conveyances for disabled veterans and an additional $8,614,800 for administrative medical, hospital, and domiciliary services.

Public Law 844, approved September 27, 1950: Permits a member of the Naval Reserve or the Marine Corps Reserve, to waive receipt of a pension, disability allowance, etc., to which he is entitled because of prior military service, and receive in lieu thereof compensation, including travel and other expenses for active duty.

Westchester's No. 1 Woman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RALPH A. GAMBLE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 1, 1951

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House, I present for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Daily Times, of Larchmont, N. Y., commending the service of the retiring commissioner of public welfare of Westchester County, N. Y., Ruth Taylor.

We who have known Miss Taylor and have worked with her for many years realize what her retirement from active service is going to mean to the county and a great personal loss to all of us individually. The editorial from the Daily Times follows:

WESTCHESTER'S NO. 1 WOMAN

If one were asked to name the woman who has left the greatest imprint of her personality and genius upon Westchester during the last quarter-century, or even the greater part of the half-century, there could be but one answer—Ruth Taylor.

Since 1916 she has been connected with the Westchester County Department of Public Welfare. First, she was assistant to V. Everit Macy, dating far back when he held the office of supervisor of the poor. Then she was deputy commissioner and since 1931 she has been commissioner of welfare.

It is difficult to enumerate all that this one woman has accomplished, either directly or through the help of others whom she has inspired and fired with her own spark of enthusiasm and perseverance. But here are a few high lights:

The mother's allowance law—designed to keep fatherless children in the home; aid to dependent children—a recognition of the public responsibility for the little ones in distress; the children's court law—not initiated here but developed to the practical point where it became a pattern for the Nation. These are three great forward steps in social security which Commissioner Taylor mothered.

During a career which has spanned two World Wars, she has been either in control or close thereto of our county hospitals and county home, for aged and indigent, and county penitentiary at Grasslands and East View. It was under her administration that our magnificent adult tuberculosis building was completed and operated; she has made Sunshine Cottage for youngsters afflicted with tuberculosis a model for the rest of the world to pattern upon.

On top of this, as social security grew, there was placed upon her shoulders the tremendous job of proper, efficient, honest distribution of public funds, running into the millions, for welfare and relief, for care of orphans, for old-age pensions, for family and child welfare, for placement of children in boarding homes, for aid to the blind, and all the other categories of service to the poor, sick—the unfortunates of our troubled world.

For year after year the budget entrusted to Commissioner Taylor has been larger than the budgets of all other county departments combined. She has been directly responsible for the honest distribution of many millions of dollars, from not only the county but also from the State and Federal Governments. The paper work alone in this field has been tremendous.

Much of what Miss Taylor initiated here in Westchester, under the advice and with the cooperation of her predecessors, especially Mr. Macy, and with the guidance of the late William L. Ward, longtime political "boss" of Westchester, has served as the blueprint for State and national pioneering into social service. Gov. Al Smith copied much of the Westchester picture for the State; Gov. F. D. Roosevelt took much of it to Washington.

And now Commissioner Taylor is to retire at the close of business Sunday night. We can hardly find words to describe the loss the county will sustain.

She blazed the way in Westchester, and as mentioned, in State and Nation, for common-sense welfare standards which the taxpayer could afford. She has fought for almost a half century for a wider public acceptance of the philosophy that we are, after all, our brother's keeper. She has stood firm against criticism and has yet been conciliatory in the application of new methods.

Withal, she has been modest, and has spiced her official demeanor with an elfin sense of humor which is delightful. Throughout her whole career there has been evident, in personal and in official acts, a sense of personal love for her fellow men, and especially for children, which has endeared her to thousands. It is not an exaggeration at all to call her the mother of social security here in Westchester, the program which through countless trips to Albany and Washington she nurtured to national status.

It is with profound regret that, speaking on behalf of all of Westchester, we mark her departure from public life.

It is not often that any community is blessed with her kind.

The Commissioning of Communists in the United States Army, 1941–46

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STYLES BRIDGES
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore agreed to, I ask that the following compilation of material entitled "The Commissioning of Communists in the United States Army," be included in the Appendix of the permanent RECORD. This compilation was prepared by the staff of the minority policy committee and contains its own documentation.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMISSIONING OF COMMUNISTS IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY, 1941–46

Seldom has a greater shock been given to the national sense of security than when it was discovered early in 1945 that, long before the Yalta Conference, the bars had been let down to Communists in the United States Army.

The administration's record for concealment and secrecy is well known. To this day no detailed and forthright account of the genesis of the soft-Communist policy in the Army has been forthcoming from administration sources. Had it not been for an energetic press and some determined effort from Congress, nothing would ever have reached the public at all.

What happened in the Navy is only fragmentarily known. Andrew Roth is an instance. Lt. (jg) Andrew Roth, of Naval Intelligence, was one of the principals in the Amerasia case. On August 10, 1945, the grand jury returned a true bill against Roth, but on February 13, 1946, the Department of Justice entered a nolle prosequi in his case. The Amerasia incident continued to rumble, however, and in 1946 a subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary held an investigation in closed session. In the committee report (H. Rept. No. 2732, 79th Cong., 2d sess.) Representative SPRINGER in his minority views made the categorical statement that: "The evidence presented at the hearings disclosed the fact that Andrew Roth, a lieutenant (junior grade) in our Navy was known to be a Communist by the board passing upon and granting commissions in the Navy, and that fact was so known at the time he was recommended for a commission as a lieutenant (junior grade) in the Navy." Nothing ever happened to Roth and in September 1950 his name appeared on the masthead of the Nation, a weekly New York periodical.

Aside from such instances as the above, the degree of Communist infiltration in the Navy is a matter entirely of surmise. Official records on the subject, if any, are not presently available.

It is the Army with which this memorandum is concerned. It is based upon the available documentary evidence.

Early in 1945 a subcommittee of the House Military Affairs Committee was conducting an investigation of the war effort. The committee began to hear, from various sources, that numerous persons with Communist affiliations held Army commissions. There were other rumors. According to Helen Lombard, a Washington newspaperwoman: "On January 7, 1945, I got a telephone call from a State Department friend who told me that something of momentous importance was brewing. We met and he informed me that the War Department had just issued a directive removing former barriers against the commissioning of Communists in the highly confidential services of the United States Army." [1]

On February 2, 1945, Representative GEORGE DONDERO, of Michigan, having heard the rumors, wrote the War Department and asked for particulars. He received no immediate reply.

What would have happened to the House committee's investigation cannot be guessed had it not been that the Washington bureau of the Chicago Tribune on February 18, 1945, secured a copy of the secret directive and broke the story the next day, February 19.

The Tribune account stated that the secret directive had been issued December 30, 1944, and had been signed at the direction of the Secretary of War by Brig. Gen. Robert H. Dunlop, on that date acting Adjutant General of the Army. The account directly quoted the very heart of the directive, which was as follows:

"No action will be taken under the reference letter that is predicated on membership in or adherence to the doctrines of the Communist Party unless there is a specific finding that the individual involved has a loyalty to the Communist Party which overrides his loyalty to the United States." [2]

This immediately raised the question as to whether it was possible for a Communist to have a loyalty to the United States which was not overridden by his loyalty to the Communist Party. Since the Communist record in lying, deception, and prevarication, where it will help them reach their ends, is well established, how could the Army be satisfied about which loyalty overrode which?

It was true that, at the moment, the United States was a war ally of the Soviet Union, but it had not been forgotten that the American Communist Party and their fellow travelers employed every propaganda and obstructional device from the day the Nazi-Soviet pact was signed in August 1939 to the day of Hitler's invasion of Russia (June 22, 1941) to keep the United States from making overt moves against Germany.

Among those propaganda devices was the American peace mobilization, directed by Frederick Vanderbilt Field, which picketed the White House up to the moment the German troops moved against the Russians.

Furthermore, the military services had had long-standing regulations rejecting from military service anyone who embraced doctrines advocating the overthrow of the United States Government by force and violence. The Adjutant General had declared that the Hatch Act likewise "forces the rejection for military service of all persons holding membership in any political party or organization which advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States." The Communist Party record on this score was clear enough. Communists had been advocating such an overthrow for years. Furthermore, the function of the American Communist Party as the obedient and active arm of a foreign power had been well established.

This was not all. The Adjutant General, himself, wrote that—

"Long experience and careful investigation showed conclusively the virtual impossibility of developing actual, legal proof of membershp in the Communist Party on the part of persons desiring to conceal such membership. The Communist Party took action to prevent the Hatch Act being applied to its members in the Army by giving them leaves of absence in such a manner as to constitute at least a suspension of membership in the party." [4]

If all these things were true, then why should a directive state that no action was to be taken on a soldier or an officer who was a Communist, unless it was found that the individual had a loyalty to the Communist Party which overrode his loyalty to the United States? Why should the Army accept Communists at all? And, since Communist membership is hard to prove, why should not the past history of the individual, his background, his affiliations, and close association with Communists be taken as decisive and be sufficient reason for immediate rejection?

The Tribune account (February 19, 1945) went on to say:

"Under the new directive the following posts, some of them highly confidential, are now open to Communists:

"Officer candidate schools, as candidate.

"Aviation cadet training.

"Security and intelligence duties.

"Duties in connection with the information, education, and orientation of troops or the educational reconditioning of troops. (To include training for such duties.)

"Headquarters units of companies (or similar units) and higher organizations.

"Clerical duties.

"G–3 and S–3 duties.

"Duty as an operator of signal communication.

"Instructor or administrative personnel of replacement depots.

"Duties requiring maintenance and repair of confidential or secret equipment.

"Duties affording opportunities to observe confidential or secret equipment closely.

"Duties allowing knowledge of the tactical dispositions of submarine mine fields.

"Signal Corps units providing communication, signal intelligence, photographic, repair or depot supply services.

"Ordnance units providing ammunition or depot supply services.

"Quartermaster units providing gasoline or depot supply services.

"Chemical units providing chemical munitions or depot supply services.

"Duties affording frequent access to secret and confidential matter or opportunity to injure the war effort."

The publication of the Tribune account of the directive expedited a War Department reply to Representative DONDERO's February 5 request for information. On February 20, the day after the Tribune story, Major General Ulio, the Adjutant General, wrote to Congressman DONDERO at great length.

The letter concluded with this passage:

"I am inclosing herewith a copy of the instructions under discussion. The War Department had classified this document because of its firm conviction that public discussion of its investigative procedures could only nullify them and make even more difficult the determination of the loyalty of its personnel. Since the provisions of this document have been publicized, however, the War Department has no alternative other than to remove the classification." [5]

Once the secret directive had got into the public domain, the House Military Affairs Committee resumed its investigation. Open hearings were held on February 27, March 14, and briefly, on July 18, 1945. A closed executive session was held on May 24, 1945. The witnesses were Assistant Secretary of War McCloy, Maj. Gen. Clayton Bissell, Chief of Intelligence, United States Army, and Maj.

[1] While They Fought, by Helen Lombard, New York, Charles Scribners Sons, 1947, p. 308. Miss Lombard discusses this incident of the directive in considerable detail and also the attempted destruction of the Counterintelligence Service's records on subversives, a move checkmated only by the quick action of the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

[2] A verbatim copy of the directive follows as exhibit No. 2 at the conclusion of this memorandum. The phrase "reference letter" in the passage quoted above refers to a confidential communication sent to the same officers under date of February 5, 1944, outlining procedure for "the disposition of subversive and disaffected personnel." This communication, which is given as exhibit No. 1 at the conclusion of this memorandum, was set aside by the December 30, 1944, directive.

Gen. W. J. Donovan, Director of the Office of Strategic Services. Into the hearings for the final session (July 18) there were introduced for the record the histories of a number of officers who had backgrounds showing long-standing Communist affiliations. The committee also issued a report on June 29, 1945.[5]

This was not the first effort to find out what the Army was doing about Communists in its ranks. Congressional trust in the handling of the Army's files had been severely shaken by the Senate Military Affairs Committee's discoveries in the previous year.

On May 18, 1944, the Senate Military Affairs Committee learned that an order had been issued on May 7, 1944, to destroy the copies of subversive records within the War Department and to remove originals from control of the Department by putting them into the hands of the archivists and consigning them to oblivion.[6]

On May 19, 1944, a member of the Senate committee went to the War Department. Secretary Stimson told the Senator that he had heard of the order for the first time at 6 o'clock the previous evening when he had received a telephone call from Secretary Hull in connection with it. General Marshall, the Chief of Staff, disclaimed all knowledge of the order. Other high ranking officers stated that they were in a similar state of ignorance. Finally the Deputy Chief of Staff admitted that he knew about the directive. When asked why such an important step could be authorized without the knowledge of the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff, the deputy intimated that the instructions had come from higher up.[7]

It was deduced that "higher up" could only mean the White House, but if the deduction were true, the person at the White House who had issued such an order was not disclosed.

The upshot of these preliminary conversations was the prompt appointment of a subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee which, as promptly, went to the Pentagon to investigate. It was finally established that an order had been sent, in the form of a letter, to Major General Bissell, the head of Military Intelligence. "The most important result (of the Senate investigation) was that the War Department made a pledge not to destroy the files on subversives." [8]

With this episode of the Army's records on subversives in the congressional background, the House Military Affairs Subcommittee went into its open hearings.

The first hearing on February 27, 1945, had as witnesses Assistant Secretary of War McCloy and Major General Bissell, Chief of Intelligence, United States Army.

Mr. McCloy submitted for the record both of the secret directives, that of February 5, 1944, and the one that displaced it on December 30, 1944. In the case of the February directive, one paragraph was excised.[9]

After this Mr. McCloy proceeded to a discussion of the Army's policy. At great length he told of the difficulty of establishing the facts in the case of suspects and how it had finally been concluded that each case must be judged on its merits. Important also was the question as to whether or not it could be conclusively shown that the suspect did, in so many words, believe in the overthrow of the Government by violence.

"The CHAIRMAN. Then, if I understand you, if a man said he was a Communist, or if there was some evidence that he was affiliated with the so-called Communist Party, you would not necessarily hold that that man belongs to a political party that favors overthrow of our present form of government?

"Mr. MCCLOY. We cannot take that position in the light of the great confusion that exists in the judicial tribunals of the country as to whether that is a tenet of the Communist Party or not." [10]

Again, on the same point:

"Mr. MCCLOY. If he said he believed in the overthrow of the United States Government by violence, then we would not commission him. If he said he was a Communist or a member of the Communist Party, we would weigh, with double strictness, the other factors to determine in the end whether or not he ought to be commissioned. That is what we tried to say in the December 30 letter." [11]

To the question: "In this directive of December 30, 1944, you very clearly provide a person might be a member of the Communist Party and still be commissioned as an officer in the Army of the United States?"

Mr. McCloy replied: "Yes; that is so." [12]

Upon the conclusion of Mr. McCloy's testimony, Major General Bissell appeared as a witness. He was asked this question:

"The CHAIRMAN. As I understand you, there is not within your knowledge, any officer of the United States, no man now in the Army holding a commission who is a Communist?

"Major General BISSELL: That is correct." [13]

Almost immediately after this hearing the Chicago Tribune published a dispatch from its Washington bureau, which was, in effect, a reply to the contention General Bissell made at the hearing.

The dispatch read as follows:

"Evidence was disclosed tonight which appeared to contradict the testimony yesterday of high War Department officials that no Communist has been given an Army commission.

"The names of 10 Army officers, about whose Communist connections there can be little question in the light of official records, have been obtained by the Tribune and turned over to a member of the House Military Affairs Subcommittee investigating the Army's recent directive permitting the commissioning of Communists.

"These names were obtained in a brief preliminary investigation which indicated the presence of a large group of Communists holding Army commissions. An Army intelligence officer estimated the number at 'at least 500.'

"The Communist Political Association, successor to the Communist Party, has boasted that it has more than 10,000 members in the military forces. Inquiry indicates that many of these hold highly confidential posts involving what the Army calls sensitive duties." [14]

The dispatch then listed the names of a major, a captain and eight lieutenants along with an account of their communistic connections.

Meantime, the Communists themselves had greeted the open publication of the December 30, 1944, directive with a shout of triumph. The March 4, 1945, Daily Worker published an exultant article by Earl Browder in which the Communist leader declared:

"Appearing before the House Military Affairs Subcommittee February 27, Assistant Secretary of War McCloy and Major General Bissell delivered a deadly blow to the ancient Red bogey. They confirmed the information that the Army has removed the rule, * * * that Communist opinions or affiliations should act as a bar to promotions in the Armed Forces, especially to officers' commissions and special services."

Ten days later, Representative Hugh DeLacy, of the State of Washington, a Congressman whose sympathies and affiliations were well known, introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a "Statement in support of Army order regarding criteria for judging loyalty in granting commissions and in making other Army appointments, March 1945." This statement said:

"With regard to the questions of rendering Communists and Communist sympathizers eligible for Army commissions, we support the War Department position as reported in the press that in granting commissions and making various other Army assignments the basic consideration is not the propriety of the individual's opinions; but his loyalty to the United States."

Many of the signers of the statement had publicly shown their loyalty to the Communist cause over a long period of time.

Among the signers were Paul Robeson, central figure of the Peekskill riot, who has just had his passport revoked. There was Frederick Myers, a member of the New York seaman's branch of the Communist Party. There was Howard Fast who has just finished (September 1, 1950) a prison sentence for contempt of Congress, and John Howard Lawson, who is in prison now for the same offense. Rockwell Kent, more recently president of the International Workers Order, was one of the signers, and so was Donald Ogden Stewart, toastmaster at Communist dinners. The list included Grant Oakes of the United Farm and Metal Workers who was also a director of the Communist Abraham Lincoln School in Chicago. Another Communist-controlled labor boss was Julius Emspak who, a few weeks ago, in July 1950, was cited for contempt of the Senate. There were scores of other names.[15]

On March 13, 1945, the House subcommittee held another open hearing and Major General Bissell returned as a witness. Since at the previous hearing he had replied in the affirmative to the statement that there was no one in the Army holding a commission who was a Communist, the subcommittee's attention was at once directed to this phase of the subject. The chairman read off the list of names which had already appeared in the Chicago Tribune and other papers. General Bissell was then asked to tell the committee what he knew about these men and their political affiliations.

"General BISSELL. The allegations made against these 10 officers in the news stories were not new to the War Department. Except for a few statements, known by the Army to be unfounded, the press stories are, generally speaking, a rehash of information previously available. * * * All 10 officers were commissioned many months before the War Department's December 30, 1944,

"The CHAIRMAN. I would like to ask the Secretary if these two directives which he has furnished members of the committee can be offered for the record as they are.

"Mr. MCCLOY. Both of them can be offered for the record, except one paragraph of the February 5 letter, which we would prefer to have deleted from the record if possible. * * * The paragraph referred to is 6 (c) of the February 5, 1944, directive."

directive was issued so that it could have had no possible bearing on the action taken in these 10 cases. Seven of these 10 officers have been commissioned for more than 17 months." [16]

In its March 1, 1945, dispatch, previously cited, the Chicago Tribune had not only listed 10 officers but had given with each name a considerable amount of associational detail. Lt. Irving Goff will serve as an example. The Tribune's dispatch said:

"Lt. Irving Goff, present assignment unknown. He was a speaker at the Communist Workers' School in New York City in 1941 and the Daily Worker publicized his talk. He went on record in the official Communist daily as protesting against the imprisonment of Earl Browder, February 2, 1941." [17]

General Bissell had this to say about Lieutenant Goff:

"Lt. Irving Goff voluntarily enlisted at Washington, D. C., on December 10, 1942, and sailed from the United States early in 1943. While serving overseas he was awarded the Good Conduct Medal. After more than 6 months' service in an active theater of operations, Goff was commissioned a second lieutenant in recognition of his abilities and service. While serving as a commissioned officer he received a commendation for meritorious service while an enlisted man for saving the life of a civilian at the risk of his own. On May 27, 1944, he was promoted to first lieutenant overseas." [18]

Representative ELSTON questioned General Bissell about the names, of which Lieutenant Goff was one:

"Representative ELSTON. You seem to take serious exception to newspaper articles which have set forth the records of certain officers before they were commissioned. Is there anything in any of those newspaper articles that is untrue?

"General BISSELL. Many of them were not true upon investigation.

"Representative ELSTON. Which were not true?

"General BISSELL. I would have to take it up item by item to do that, but these same allegations were made and had reached the War Department, and the War Department had investigated each one of them and found they were not based on fact, or, if the allegation itself were correct, it did not establish disloyalty or did not prove that the individual advocated the overthrow of the Government of the United States. * * *

"I investigated all the allegations individually that were made in the press. I do not feel it is desirable or that you would wish to try these officers charge by charge, based on newspaper articles when they are not here to defend themselves. * * * I do not feel I should go into specific questions with regard to the individuals unless they are given an opportunity to defend themselves.

"Representative ELSTON. You have gone into great detail and given us one side of the story. I want to find out whether or not the reports given to the public have been true or not. We simply want the facts, General. We do not want to reflect on anybody, but we want to get the facts. * * *

"General BISSELL. I think your question is entirely justified, but I also think if I go further in answering this line of questioning I will get into what is in our investigative records and you will ask me how I know he said what and immediately the whole value of our investigative procedure is gone. * * *

"Representative ELSTON. You mean you are not willing to submit to this committee the records of persons who have been commissioned in the Army of the United States?

"General BISSELL. The policy of the War Department has not been to make available to Congress the investigative records, the detail of investigative records in the military service." [19]

At this point in the hearing, General Bissell gave to the chairman a letter from Secretary of War Stimson in which the Secretary stated formally that the records would not be given up. [20]

Before this blank wall the subcommittee was brought to a halt. Statements had been publicly made that there were numerous Communist officers in the Army; 10 men were named specifically as examples. The Army stated that they had investigated the statements about these men and then categorically refused to tell the Military Affairs Committee whether or not the charges were true.

In the face of this refusal it was impossible to discover how far the Communist infiltration of the Army had gone. What all the reasons for the secret directive of December 30, 1944, may have been, what influence may have been exerted to let the Communists in, how far they had penetrated into the intelligence service itself, how many sensitive positions they had occupied, whether or not they had transmitted secret information to Russian agents—all such questions were futile in the face of the adamantine refusal to yield up the records. The situation had reached the fantastic stage in which military rules of secrecy, which had been employed originally to protect the Army against subversives, might now be used for the purpose of protecting the subversives themselves who had been able to make their way into the Army.

Such questions may have been futile in the face of the refusal to give up the records, but they were far from idle questions. Since 1945, by slow and painful effort, the fact has been established that the executive branch was infiltrated with Communists.

It is known that Carl Marzani, once of the OSS and the State Department, had previously, under an alias, been a Communist organizer in New York City. For concealing the fact and for violation of the criminal code, he was convicted of perjury and is now serving a prison term.

It is known that, while an employee of the State Department, Henry Julian Wadleigh gave secret documents to Soviet agents, for he confessed it under oath.

The facts about Alger Hiss are known.

The facts about Judith Coplon are known.

Some of the facts about the men who gave secret information about atomic energy to Russian agents are known, for some have confessed and are already under prison sentence. But how far the infiltration in the Army went we do not yet know.

We know that the secret directive was issued and we know that on March 4, 1946, it was rescinded, but the immediate circumstances of the rescission we don't know and we don't yet have the records.

And we do know something about Irving Goff.

1. We know that on February 27, 1945, the Chief of Intelligence of the United States Army affirmed that within his knowledge there was no man then in the Army holding a commission who was a Communist.

2. We know that on March 1, 1945, the Chicago Tribune identified Lt. Irving Goff as an officer with "communistic connections."

3. We know that on March 14, 1945, the Chief of Intelligence refused to say whether his investigations had shown that Lieutenant Goff was a Communist or not.

4. We know that at the Military Affairs Subcommittee hearing on July 18, 1945, these statements about Goff were submitted for the record:

"Lt. Irving Goff, ASN O2055[illegible]8, Office of Strategic Services, box 2601, Washington 13, D. C. * * * executive secretary of Veterans of Abraham Lincoln Brigade. * * * One Irving Goff, of 2930 West Nineteenth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., signed Communist Party petition for Browder-Ford in 1940. There (is) no such address as * * * 2930 West Nineteenth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y."

5. We know that the Daily Worker on May 29, 1949, identified Lieutenant Goff as chairman of the Communist Party State organization in Louisiana.

During the hearings both Mr. McCloy and General Bissell made much of the fact that a number of the accused officers had behaved with gallantry in action. The implication was that it was unthinkable that a brave soldier could be a Communist.

That is a very singular implication. No more resolute and intrepid men ever lived than Nikolai Lenin and Josef Stalin. They and their fellows engineered a revolution and thereafter set up the Communist International, the purpose of which was the utilization of non-Russian Communist Parties for the defense and aggrandizement of the power of the toilers' homeland.

In obedience to the Comintern's dictates, the American Communist Party shifts its line. If it be in order that American Communists should enter the United States Army to help in the task of this aggrandizement, then the American Communist Party will work to put them there. But American citizens, whose allegiance still is given to the Nation and the society in which they live, would like to know who the persons in the administration were who were responsible for letting down the Army bars to Communists. They are still more interested in knowing right now, when they read the daily casualty lists, realizing that those Americans who die meet their death at the hands of Communists.

EXHIBIT NO. 1

Below is a copy of the directive outlining procedure for the "Disposition of Subversive and Disaffected Military Personnel," sent to commanding officers February 5, 1944. This directive was submitted for the record to the House Military Affairs Subcommittee investigating the war effort, on February 27, 1945, by Assistant Secretary of War John McCloy. At Mr. McCloy's request paragraph 6 (c) was excised.

It was this directive which was set aside by the directive issued December 30, 1944. The December 30, 1944, directive follows as exhibit No. 2.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington 25, D. C., February 5, 1944.

Subject: Disposition of subversive and disaffected military personnel.

To: The commanding generals Army Air Forces, Army Ground Forces, Army Service Forces; commander in chief, Southwest Pacific area; the commanding generals, theaters of operations, defense commands, departments, service commands, military district of Washington; ports of embarkation; base commands; the commanding officers, ports of embarkation, base commands, posts, camps, and stations.

1. Letter, AG 014.311 (8 Jan. 44) OB-S-B-M, 14 January 1944, subject: Disposition of Subversive and Potentially Subversive Military Personnel, is rescinded, except insofar as parts thereof rescind other letters of this office.

2. Responsibility: This letter will govern the disposition in the Zone of the Interior of subversive and disaffected military personnel. Disposition of subversive and disaffected officers and enlisted men is a responsibility of command which responsibility will be exercised, subject to the provisions of this letter, so as to maintain security, discipline, and morale. The commanding generals of the three major commands are responsible for carrying out the policies and procedures established by this letter and for keeping the War Department currently informed of all general instructions issued thereunder.

3. Definitions: The phrase "subversive personnel" is defined for the purpose of this letter as personnel engaging in, or who, while in the Army, have engaged in, subversive activity of any sort. The phrase "disaffected personnel" is defined as personnel who lack affection for or loyalty to the Government and Constitution of the United States. The use of the phrase "potentially subversive personnel" will be discontinued.

4. When investigation will be made: Investigation to determine whether an officer or enlisted man is subversive or disaffected will be initiated only upon reliable information of sufficient seriousness so that, when weighed against the individual's known reputation and record of service, it compels a grave suspicion that he is subversive or disaffected. The determination in each case as to whether investigation is justified will be made by a responsible officer having command jurisdiction over the individual concerned.

5. When action will be taken: (a) General: Action will be taken only upon verified factual information which positively establishes that the individual concerned is subversive or disaffected. No temporary or permanent action or restriction adverse to the interest of any officer or enlisted man will be taken until such proof has been adduced.

(b) Exception: As an exception to the statements in 5a, persons under investigation for subversive activity or disaffection will not be assigned to:

(1) Officer candidate schools, as candidates.

(2) Aviation cadet training.

(3) Security and intelligence duties.

(4) Duties in connection with radar.

(5) Duties in connection with secret or confidential cryptographic systems or equipment.

Persons under investigation as above also will not be assigned to or retained in organizations or units alerted for foreign service, including Alaska.

6. Permanent disposition. (a) Court martial: In all cases of proven subversive activity by either officer or enlisted personnel, commanding officers will institute court-martial proceedings when legally justified. It is desired by the War Department that investigations for subversive activity, as distinguished from disaffection, be directed primarily at obtaining evidence to support court-martial charges.

(b) Internment: Enlisted men who are enemy aliens and whose subversive activities warrant internment will be discharged into the custody of the Department of Justice. Upon request of the man's commanding officer, the facts in cases deemed to come within this category will be referred to the nearest United States attorney by the commanding general of the service command, in accordance with MR 1-11, paragraph 17. The soldier will be discharged only after notification has been received that the Attorney General has ordered the individual's internment.

(c) (Excised from the record at the request of Assistant Secretary of War McCloy.)

(d) Nonsensitive duties: When investigation or facts otherwise obtained prove that an enlisted man is disaffected but not sufficiently dangerous to warrant transfer to a special organization under the terms of 6c above, he will not be permitted to remain in or be transferred to any of the duties mentioned in subparagraphs 5b 1, 2, 3, 4, or 5, or any other duties which afford frequent access to secret or confidential matter or opportunity seriously to injure the war effort. No restriction, for counterintelligence reasons, will be placed on the transfer to overseas installations of men described in this subparagraph. Except for the duties stated in 5b 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 above the determination of what assignments give frequent access to secret or confidential matter or other opportunity seriously to injure the war effort is a function of command. Any lists of sensitive duties prepared by the commanding generals of the major commands for guidance of commanding officers will, however, be submitted to the War Department for concurrence prior to issuance.

(e) Pacific transfers: When investigation or facts otherwise obtained indicate the presence of a reasonable understandable refusal or reluctance on the part of a soldier to bear arms against a particular European enemy and further indicates no disloyalty to this country other than that which can be inferred from his expression of refusal or reluctance to fight, he will be transferred by the major command concerned to an organization likely to have combat duty in the Alaskan or Pacific theater of operation.

(1) The refusal or reluctance to fight a particular European enemy must be expressed.

(2) The presence of close relatives, a background which is not remote, or citizenship in an enemy country will constitute sufficient grounds to cause the reluctance or refusal to be understandable.

The service record of any individual transferred or selected for transfer under this subparagraph will be marked "not available for service in European or African theater of operation."

(f) Officer candidates: No officer candidate will be removed from officer candidate school prior to the completion of his course, or his commission withheld, for counterintelligence reasons, without the concurrence of the War Department.

(g) Officers: Only subparagraph a of this paragraph is applicable to commissioned officers. Commissioned officers who are proven to be subversive or disaffected will, when possible, be court-martialed or discharged or otherwise disposed of under the Articles of War or Army Regulations. If disposition as stated above is not possible, such officers will not be given assignments which will result in security being endangered by reason of their lack of loyalty and in no case will be assigned to or retained in any of the following duties:

(1) Security and intelligence duties.

(2) Duties in connection with radar.

(3) Duties in connection with secret or confidential cryptographic systems or equipment.

7. The commanding generals, domestic service commands, will furnish copies of this letter to the commanding officers of all class I, II, III, and IV installations within the territorial limits of their service commands.

By order of the Secretary of War.

J. A. ULIO,
Major General, the Adjutant General.

EXHIBIT 2

Below is a copy of the Army directive which formally let down the bars to Communists. Emphasis has been added. The document was declassified February 22, 1945, in circumstances described in the foregoing memorandum. The directive was rescinded in 1946.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington 25, D. C., December 30, 1944.

Subject: Disposition of subversive and disaffected military personnel.

To: The commanding generals, Army Air Forces, Army Ground Forces, Army Service Forces; commander in chief, Southwest Pacific area; the commanding generals, theaters of operations, defense commands, departments, service commands, Military District of Washington, ports of embarkation, base commands; the commanding officers, ports of embarkation, base commands, posts, camps, and stations.

1. Reference is made to War Department letter, AG 014.31 (31 Jan. 44) OB-S-B-M, 5 February 1944, subject: Disposition of subversive and disaffected military personnel.

2. (a) Questions have arisen as to the significance, under reference letter, of membership in, and sympathy with the views of, the Communist Party.

(b) The basic consideration is not the propriety of the individual's opinions, but his loyalty to the United States. Membership in, or strict adherence to the doctrines of, the Communist Party organizations is evidence that the individual is subject to influences that may tend to divide his loyalty. However, many good soldiers are subject to conflicting influences. Such influences must be appraised in the light of the individual's entire record. No action will be taken under the reference letter that is predicated on membership in or adherence to the doctrines of the Communist Party unless there is a specific finding that the individual involved has a loyalty to the Communist Party which overrides his loyalty to the United States. No such finding should be based on the mere fact that the individual's views on various social questions have been the same as the views which the Communist Party may have advanced. Except in clear cases, no action should be taken against persons who are being trained for combat assignments and have demonstrated a high degree of ability to serve the United States in that manner, including a willingness to accept combat duty.

3. It is desired that the commanding general of each service command make distribution of this letter to all class I, II, III, and IV installations within the territorial limits of his command.

By order of the Secretary of War:

ROBERT H. DUNLOP,
Brigadier General, Acting The Adjutant General.

EXHIBIT NO. 3

Below is a copy of a letter from the Adjutant General to Representative GEORGE A. DONDERO, of Michigan.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 20, 1945.

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DONDERO: Your letter of February 2 regarding the War Department's policy relating to alleged Communists and Communist sympathizers in the Army has been received and given the most careful consideration. The War Department is very anxious that you should understand fully its position in this matter, and for that reason I am setting forth below a complete exposition of the evolution of War Department policy on this subject. I may add that this information already, has been sent, in substance, to other Members of Congress who also have expressed interest in this problem.

Your letter relates to a secret War Department letter published under date of December 30, 1944. As you may know, before the war it long had been our policy to exclude Communists and Communist sympathizers from the Army in any capacity. This policy was relatively easy to enforce, since persons of that ideology practically never applied for admission to the Army. Further, under the system of voluntary enlistment the War Department had wide latitude in determining the qualifications and acceptability of applicants.

With the advent of selective service, however, War Department procedure in this matter had to be reconsidered. The Selective Service Act brought about the enforced induction into the Army of persons of all kinds and beliefs. This greatly limited the discretion of the War Department regarding the acceptability of inductees. The provisions of the Hatch Act were carefully considered. It forces the rejection for military service of all persons holding membership in "any political party or organization which advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States." This immediately raised a question of fact—the fact of membership. Cognizance was taken of the opinion of the Attorney General that the Communist Party "is an organization that believes in, advises, advocates, and teaches the overthrow by force and violence of the Government of the United States."

It was clear that the burden of proof in applying the Hatch Act was squarely on the Army. Legal proof of membership had to be established. Manifestly this had to be done with certainty, not only as a matter of justice but also to avoid the obvious possibility that action on inconclusive proof might provide an escape corridor to relieve considerable numbers of persons from the hazards of combat service in defense of the United States and might even drive persons seeking to avoid military service into the ranks of the Communist Party. The Hatch Act did not refer to persons of communistic ideology who were not members of the Communist Party.

For the reasons given above, the War Department acted with great care in formulating procedures suitable for the war emergency. As a preliminary measure, pending the determination of proof of actual membership, a policy was established that persons strongly suspected of membership in the Communist Party or who appeared to be consistent followers of the Communist Party line were excluded from sensitive duties and from being commissioned officers. A great number of such cases were investigated and handled with a view to making a final determination. Long experience and careful investigation showed conclusively the virtual impossibility of developing actual, legal proof of membership in the Communist Party on the part of persons desiring to conceal such membership. The Communist Party took action to prevent the Hatch Act being applied to its members in the Army by giving them leaves of absence in such manner as to constitute at least a suspension of membership in the party. It has been held that proof of past membership in the Communist Party is not conclusive proof that the individual thereafter continued to be a member of the party. As a result of these considerations the War Department has found itself in a difficult position legally to take effective action under the Hatch Act.

In the meanwhile, the policy of applying certain restrictions to alleged Communists which was stated in the preceding paragraph was continued in effect. This has been an exceedingly difficult policy to enforce with justice to the individual and fairness to the Government. Long experience in handling cases of this character has convinced the War Department that mere sympathy with a given ideology or suspected membership in a given organization neither legally nor as a matter of abstract justice furnishes sufficient justification for adverse action. It has been found that the only sound, though difficult, solution of this problem is to base action on the attitude and actions of the individual rather than on his alleged connections. For that reason a confidential letter was issued on February 5, 1944, establishing individual attitudes and actions as the basis of restrictive determination. A copy of this letter is enclosed for your information. It will be noted that this letter does not single out any particular organization or ideology but placed the policy squarely on the question of loyalty to the Government of the United States on the part of the individual in question. It is believed that this policy is sound.

During the period from February 5, 1944, to December 30, 1944, it was found that there were difficulties in implementing the policy then in force. Cases continued to be resolved and action taken by subordinate elements purely on suspected sympathy with communism without full exploration of the actual attitude and actions of the individual in question and without establishing legal proof of membership in the Communist Party. Numerous inquiries were received from lower echelons for further clarification of the question of establishing communism with relation to the letter of February 5, 1944. As a result the matter was exhaustively reviewed in the War Department for a period extending over some 6 months before issuance of the letter of December 30, 1944, to which you refer. During the period of consideration the War Department examined the question in detail, with particular attention to the terms of the Hatch Act. Consideration was given to the fact that persons in the Army suspected of, but not proven to be, Communists had not proved to be a source of any difficulty and were loyally supporting the war effort. There seemed little justification, therefore, not to use the services of such persons to the fullest in all capacities for which they were qualified.

This matter is not a closed issue in the War Department. The application of this procedure will be watched with great care and it will be modified as may be shown necessary in the light of experience or in the light of changed conditions. No person, who after thorough investigation by the War Department of disloyalty, has been given access to secret Army equipment or to any vital Army matters. I trust that the foregoing explanation of the position of the War Department in this matter is satisfactory to you and that you agree as regards the practical wisdom of the course of action adopted.

I am enclosing herewith a copy of the instructions under discussion. The War Department had classified this document because of its firm conviction that public discussion of its investigative procedures could only nullify them and make even more difficult the determination of the loyalty of its personnel. Since the provisions of this document have been publicized, however, the War Department has no alternative other than to remove the classification.

Sincerely yours,

J. A. ULIO,
Major General, The Adjutant General.

EXHIBIT NO. 4

Below is a copy of a letter from Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson to the chairman of the House Military Affairs Subcommittee, declining to permit the disclosure of files on Army officers who had been named as having Communist sympathies or affiliations. This letter, dated March 12, 1945, was submitted for the record, March 13, 1945.

MARCH 12, 1945.

Hon. R. EWING THOMASON,
Chairman, Subcommittee House Military Affairs Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. THOMASON: I am informed that the subcommittee (of which you are chairman) of the House Military Affairs Committee has asked Major General Bissell, Assistant Chief of Staff, G–2, to appear before it tomorrow and be questioned concerning 10 Army officers who have been named in certain press stories as having Communist sympathies or affiliations.

In the course of his testimony with reference to these officers, or other military personnel, General Bissell may be asked to disclose to the subcommittee the military-intelligence files of such individuals or to answer questions with respect to the same. In such event, I have instructed General Bissell to present this letter to you in order that your subcommittee will understand the reasons why I must decline to permit such files to be disclosed or testimony to be given with reference to them.

The reasons do not arise from any desire to conceal anything from your subcommittee. The Assistant Secretary of War and the Assistant Chief of Staff, G–2, have already testified at length as to the War Department's existing regulations and the nature of its investigatory procedures in determining the loyalty of its personnel. The War Department is prepared, as I explain below, to give upon your request further information concerning the loyalty of its officers. But the records of investigations made by the Military Intelligence Division of the General Staff with reference to the loyalty of individual officers are confidential in nature for the use of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff.

The usefulness of the Military Intelligence Division's work is, to great extent, based on the secrecy of its investigations and files.

Military Intelligence investigators must be free to inform higher authority of any pertinent conclusions, whether or not supported by strict proof, and to include in their files hearsay, opinion, and even contradictory evidence.

They would not feel free to do so if the contents of their reports were to be subject to general scrutiny.

Also, Military Intelligence reports are based on investigations not armed with the power of subpena. The testimony of civilians which they contain is usually given only by promise of confidential treatment. If such reports were to be disclosed, the ability of the investigators to obtain confidential information in the future would be seriously diminished if not destroyed.

Furthermore, such files usually contain confidential reports requested by Military Intelligence of and received by it from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and other investigative agencies, with the understanding that the same will not be revealed. The War Department does not feel free to break faith with these agencies. To do so would mean that their vital assistance in future investigations of disloyal or subversive personnel would be lost.

Our view in this matter is in accord with the opinion of the Attorney General, expressed in a letter of April 30, 1941, to the Honorable CARL VINSON, chairman of the House Committee on Naval Affairs, in which, in declining to accede to a request to produce similar files of the Department of Justice, the Attorney General stated that "all investigative reports are confidential documents of the executive department of the Government" and that "congressional or public access to them would not be in the public interest." Certain portions of the Attorney General's opinion, which he supports with a citation of many precedents and court decisions, are so pertinent that I have attached them to this letter.

In addition to the foregoing, there are considerations here involved peculiar to the armed services, and of especially compelling nature in wartime. The cases of certain officers will involve not only their own security, and the security of those serving under them and with them, but also our military relationship with our allies in combat areas. Entirely apart from any issue of security, however, there is another serious consideration which exists in the case of all officer personnel. In the course of determining loyalty, the War Department obtains from the individuals concerned and from other sources confidential information concerning the personal beliefs, personal affiliations, and other factors bearing on the loyalty of its individual officers and men. The War Department has always felt a responsibility to preserve the confidence of this information. This position does not rest alone on fairness to the individual. It is of paramount importance to the Army itself that all military personnel shall be assured that confidential information concerning them will not be disclosed, except in the course of proper judicial proceedings and under the constitutional safeguards guaranteed to every American citizen. In any such proceeding, the individual would have the right to be present in person and be confronted by his accusers.

The War Department will welcome from your subcommittee new evidence bearing on any individual's loyalty and will review such individual's case in the light thereof and report its findings based thereon to your subcommittee. The War Department is at all times prepared to state to your subcommittee an individual's military record, and (in accordance with usual procedure) to exhibit in executive session such individual's Army personnel file (201 file). Furthermore, if the Congress desires specific information about any considerable number of officers that this subcommittee will name in confidence to the War Department, the War Department will examine the files of such individuals and supply therefrom to this subcommittee in executive session the data requested, in general form and without reference to particular individuals.

I know that your subcommittee will understand from what I have said that our decision not to turn over the confidential military-intelligence files of individual officers, or to answer questions concerning the same, is solely for the purpose of maintaining the long established confidential relationship of the Military Intelligence Division with the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, of protecting the future effectiveness of military-intelligence investigations, and of preserving the confidence of all officers of the Army that their individual affairs will not be disclosed, in their absence, without their having opportunity to defend in proper proceedings in accordance with those principles of American justice for which they are fighting.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of War.

Status of Irrigation and Reclamation Developments Under the Bureau of Reclamation, 17 Western States, June 30, 1950

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. MALONE
OF NEVADA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, a statement outlining the status of irrigation and reclamation developments under the Bureau of Reclamation, 17 Western States, June 30, 1950.

This statement is a supplement to the report included in the Appendix of the RECORD in volume 95, part 16, pages A6655–A6658.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATUS OF IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION DEVELOPMENTS UNDER THE BUREAU OF RECLAMATION, 17 WESTERN STATES, JUNE 30, 1950

A little over a year ago, on October 19, 1949, to be exact, I had the pleasure of reporting on the status of irrigation and power development under the Bureau of Reclamation. At that time my remarks along with complete tabulations relative to the program appeared on pages A6655 through A6658 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and in the 1949 reprint of my debates on the Senate floor. Today, I should like to bring you up to date on the reclamation program.

As is well known, the limiting factor on irrigation in the West is the availability of water that can be economically delivered to land that can be made productive through the artificial application of irrigation water. Generally speaking, the limit of irrigation in the West has been placed at approximately 40,000,00 acres out of a total of areas in the 17 Western States of 1,162,000,000 acres.

About 22,000,000 acres are now under irrigation principally through private enterprise, but including about 3,300,000 acres which have been brought under irrigation (full supply) by the Bureau of Reclamation and the Office of Indian Affairs.

In addition to this acreage Reclamation provides supplemental water for over 3,000,000 acres.

The following tabulation shows the significant increases in Reclamation's irrigation program:

The Bureau of Reclamation, greatest single agency in the world engaged in the conservation and development of land and water resources is the primary factor in the development of the western United States. This agency was created more than 49 years ago when President Theodore Roosevelt signed the Reclamation Act introduced by the great legislator from our State, the late Senator Francis G. Newlands.

This great organization has invested more than a billion and one-half dollars in reclamation projects which have contributed many times that sum to the wealth of the Nation in taxes. The greatest part of this investment will be repaid to the Treasury of the United States by the water and power users of the West. Every State in the Nation benefits from reclamation dollars which are appropriated annually by the Congress. From Connecticut to California, and from Maine to Mexico reclamation projects create employment and contribute to the economic welfare of these communities. Because it is from the many areas outside the reclamation region that the major portion of equipment and supplies used in reclamation structures are built and manufactured. Benefits to areas other than the reclamation area do not end here with construction materials. The wealth created on these projects automatically causes a demand for millions of dollars worth of clothes, household equipment, farm equipment, and thousands of other items manufactured in the East, North, South, and Central States.

In this connection it will bear repeating that the economy of the 11 States of the mountain and Pacific regions is almost wholly dependent on the irrigation developments that have led to the tremendous growth in population since the turn of the century. It will be irrigation expansion as well as the hydroelectric power developments in multiple-purpose reclamation projects that will enable the West to continue to grow and to continue to be a major factor in the future development and security of the entire country.

The people of the 17 far-western States which make up the vast arid and semiarid areas are deeply concerned with the Federal reclamation program for complete conservation of water resources for the development of irrigated lands, with the development of hydroelectric power, to assist in repayment of costs and to assure maximum use of the water and land resources. The country at large was likewise concerned with this great reclamation conservation program which was initiated under President Theodore Roosevelt when the Congress adopted the reclamation law of 1902; and it has continued its interest and concern for furthering the reclamation program during the 48 years since the national irrigation policy was written into the Federal statutes.

These figures are, in the main, taken from the Bureau of Reclamation's official crop report, the reclamation program, and from data available in the official records.

The table which is an inventory of irrigable acreage in the 17 Western States with details by States on the reclamation program is as follows:

HYDROELECTRIC POWER

Hydroelectric power is a vital factor in repayment of costs and for pumping in the irrigation development of the Federal reclamation program. Presently installed on Bureau of Reclamation projects are a total of 3,218,400 kilowatts. Authorized for construction are about 4,650,000 additional kilowatts, including the installations of about 1,450,000 kilowatts at Army dams in the Missouri Basin, where the power production will be distributed over transmission lines to be constructed by the Bureau of Reclamation. A tabulation which shows a schedule as of July 1950 for installations through 1957 is as follows:

[3] Subject to further engineering and economic studies.

[4] Power marketed by Bureau of Reclamation.

Area for which constructed works are capable of providing full water supply increased almost 60,000 acres while the area for which supplemental water is available increased more than 200,000 acres. Project areas under construction or on which work has been authorized increased almost 500,000 acres (supplemental supply).

The importance of hydroelectric power in connection with the reclamation program is highlighted from the financial side, for returns from the production and distribution of power will not only repay the cost of power facilities with interest but will materially assist in the repayment of the construction costs of irrigation facilities in many instances.

For instance, on a project like the Central Valley in California, the irrigation facilities will represent something like two-thirds of the entire construction costs of the project. While power facilities will cost only about one-third of the entire investment, the revenues from power will repay approximately two-thirds of the over-all costs. A similar ratio of the assistance by power to irrigation will prevail, I understand, in the Columbia Basin project and to some extent in the Missouri Basin project where nonreimbursable flood-control and navigation benefits are an essential part of the over-all financial picture.

Reclamation appropriations for irrigation are traditionally repayable without interest by the immediate beneficiaries who are the water users on the various projects. The Flood Control Act of 1944 which authorized the Missouri Basin project sets a new standard on repayment. The investment in power facilities bears interest, of course, but the power facilities that are a part of the irrigation development are interest free. Flood-control allocations in reclamation projects are nonreimbursable under the national flood-control policy just as the Army dams constructed for flood control represent nonreimbursable funds of the Federal Government.

From statistics on the total investments, on construction costs already incurred or presently contemplated by the Bureau of Reclamation in carrying out the program, the following tabulation is a summary:

Total expenditures by Bureau of Reclamation on irrigation and multiple-purpose projects to June 30, 1950	$2,051,303,000
Estimated cost to complete irrigation and multiple-purpose projects under or authorized for construction, including transmission facilities (but not power plants of Army dams)	4,355,351,000
Total estimated cost of completed and authorized projects	6,406,654,000

Thus, the reclamation program, including projects constructed, those under construction, or those authorized for construction represent an investment by the Federal Government of $6,406,654,000. An additional amount is represented by potential projects under investigation or proposed for investigation.

Summary of Plans for Conservation and Development of the Water Resources of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the appendix of the RECORD a review as of December 1950 of Summary of Plans for Conservation and Development of the Water Resources of the United States.

This review elucidates and brings up to date the report inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on August 6, 1948, and the review by the Corps of Engineers inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 16 pages A6673–A6677.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF PLANS FOR CONSERVATION AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE WATER RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES—REVIEW AS OF DECEMBER 1950

1. In 1948, at the request of Senator GEORGE W. MALONE, of Nevada, the chief of engineers prepared and furnished a summary of plans for conservation and development of the water resources of the United States. This study summarized the growth of Federal interest in the control, conservation and use of the water resources of the United States. The total estimated cost given for program of water resource development was $57,500,000,000, based on 1947 price levels.

2. Since this study and the cost figure given have been misinterpreted in certain publications, it appears desirable to state the following facts for clarification:

a. The study and cost estimate was prepared and plainly described merely as an effort to show the magnitude and scope of the over-all task of water resource development in the United States. It was not in any sense a program proposed by any Federal agency for the approval of Congress.

b. The study and plans of improvement summarized covered the entire United States and did not omit any geographical areas. Its only limiting factor was that more information on water resource problems and plans was available for some geographical areas than for others.

c. The study was based largely upon river basin studies of the Corps of Engineers, but included available information and cost estimates for work of other Federal agencies, as well as some local work which appeared to form a part of a water resource program. As stated in the study, it did not include all of the plans and programs of these other agencies, and the study pointed out that complete river basin development would include additional measures.

d. The study was limited to river and stream basins and did not include coastal and Great Lakes harbor improvement.

3. The cost estimates given in the initial study furnished in 1948 were considered to be based on 1947 price levels when the Engineering News Record index of construction costs stood at 413.6. As of June 30, 1950, the ENR index had risen to 506.5, indicating a rise of about 22 percent over the 1947 level. This increase in cost would be applicable to all of the estimated costs given in 1948 except the cost of completed work. While details are not available as to the exact amount of work, included in the 1948 study, that has been completed, it is estimated funds expended on such work complete or under construction have been about $5,200,000,000 as of June 30, 1950. Applying the 22 percent cost index rise to the remainder ($57,500,000,000 less $5,200,000,000 or $52,300,000,000) indicates a present estimated cost of $63,800,000,000 for completing the work outlined in the original 1948 study. As pointed out previously this study did not include all works necessary for complete water resource development. The ultimate cost would in all probability be substantially larger, as indicated in the recent studies of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission.

4. The total estimated cost given in the 1948 study of water resource development was based to a large extent upon projects and investigations under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Engineers, Department of the Army, as follows:

(a) Part representing work under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Engineers or work investigated by that agency in the course of river basin studies	$38,040,000,000
(b) Part representing work of other Federal agencies plus some work by local agencies which appeared to form a useful part of a water resource program	19,466,000,000
Total	57,506,000,000

5. The part of the estimated cost for work under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Engineers has been brought up to date to reflect costs as of June 30, 1950, and progress on works up to that date; and has been expanded to include the improvements of coastal and Great Lakes harbors which constitute an important part of any over-all program for water resource development. The revised estimated cost for work under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Engineers or investigated by that agency is:

Projects complete or in operation	$4,100,000,000
Projects under construction	4,700,000,000
Projects planned	16,000,000,000
Future plans or possibilities	21,400,000,000
Total	46,200,000,000

6. The work summarized above is largely for improvements for flood control and navigation and for conservation of water for related purposes such as the development of hydroelectric power, except that a large part (over 75 percent) of the estimated cost shown under future plans or possibilities is for purely hydroelectric power development. By far the greater part of this power would not be economical at the present time and much of it may not be economical or needed for many years to come. The totals of estimated costs are given merely to illustrate the magnitude of ultimate possibilities and costs. The figures bear no relation to any Federal program.

7. The seriousness of the flood problem in the United States and the need for control and conservation of flood water continues to be emphasized every year by recurring destructive floods. This past year has witnessed a number of such floods throughout the country. Among the most destructive were the floods on the Red River of the North in the spring of 1950 when long continued rains and melting snows on the prairies of that basin caused damages of over $32,000,000 in the United States and even heavier damage in the Canadian part of the basin where the city of Winnipeg was inundated. During the past month of December 1950, floods have caused unusually heavy damages in California and Nevada; and complete estimates of losses in these areas are not yet available.

8. On the other hand, the effectiveness of flood-control works on the Ohio and lower Mississippi Rivers was proved again in the spring of 1950 when prolonged flood flows were carried to the Gulf of Mexico without damage to protected areas.

Laws Approved and Bills Acted Upon in the Eighty-first Congress Relating to Education

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. MALONE

OF NEVADA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951 (legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a compilation entitled "Laws Approved and Bills Acted Upon in the Eighty-first Congress Relating to Education."

This brings up to date a similar list inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 16, pages A6710–A6711.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LAWS APPROVED AND BILLS ACTED UPON IN THE EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS RELATING TO EDUCATION

Chinese students:

H. R. 4830. Approved October 6, 1949. Public Law 327. Foreign Aid Appropriation Act, 1950. Authorizes the allocation of $4,000,000 of ECA funds for the tuition, subsistence, and travel expenses of selected Chinese citizens for study in American schools.

H. R. 5602. Reported in the House July 13, 1949. Makes the same provision as in H. R. 4830, above.

H. R. 7797. Approved June 5, 1950. Public Law 535. Foreign Economic Assistance Act of 1950. Authorizes the allocation of $6,000,000 of ECA funds for such educational assistance to selected Chinese in the United States.

Elementary and secondary education, financial aid: S. 246. Passed by Senate May 5, 1949. Furnishes financial aid to State elementary and secondary school system in order to equalize educational opportunities.

Federal activities, financial relief:

H. R. 3829. Approved September 10, 1949. Public Law 306. Authorizes $7,500,000 during the fiscal year 1950 for contributions to local school agencies for the maintenance and operation of schools overburdened by defense-incurred enrollments, loss of revenue from Federal acquisition of land, etc.

S. 2317. Approved September 23, 1950. Public Law 815. Authorizes $3,000,000 to be paid to the States for an inventory of existing school facilities and a survey of the need to construct additional facilities. Authorizes necessary sums during fiscal years 1951 to 1953, inclusive, for grants to local school districts for emergency school construction, the need for which has resulted from Federal activities.

H. R. 7940. Approved September 30, 1950. Public Law 874. Authorizes Federal contributions during fiscal years 1951–1954, inclusive, to compensate such agencies for loss of revenue and/or added expense due to (a) the acquisition of property by the United States within their districts; (b) the attendance at such agencies' schools by children residing on, or whose parents are employed on, Federal property, or (c) a sudden and substantial increase in enrollment as a result of Federal activities.

Finnish students: Senate Joint Resolution 3. Approved August 24, 1950. Public Law 265. Provides that future war debt payments by Finland shall be used for the technical instruction of citizens of Finland in the United States and citizens of the United States in Finland.

Indian education: Various bills make provision for the construction of schools to be available to Indians and non-Indians on an equal basis in specified communities, and for certain other local purposes relating to the education of Indians. They are: S. 170, approved March 17, 1949, Public Law 20; H. R. 4510, approved August 19, 1949, Public Law 256; H. R. 3881, approved September 7, 1949, Public Law 301; H. R. 554, approved October 6, 1949, Public Law 331; H. R. 7431, approved August 17, 1950, Public Law 709; and H. R. 7332, passed by House September 14, 1950.

Iranian students: H. R. 5731. Approved September 29, 1950, Public Law 861. Authorizes $110,000 for the education of certain Iranian students in the United States in accordance with the obligation of the United States arising out of an exchange of notes in 1924.

Labor Extension Act: S. 110. Reported in the Senate March 4, 1949. The Labor Extension Act. Provides for a program of cooperation with the States and private institutions in the dissemination among wage earners and unions of useful information on the workers' contribution to production, collective-bargaining agreements and practices, successful techniques in labor-management relations, labor law and administration, economic history, etc. Prohibits Federal control of the administration, curriculum, methods, etc., of cooperating institutions.

Medical, dental, and related education: S. 1453. Passed by the Senate September 23, 1950. The Emergency Professional Health Training Act. Provides aid to education in medicine, dentistry, nursing, and public health through scholarships and school construction grants. H. R. 5940, a companion bill, was reported in the House October 11, 1949.

National school health services: S. 1411. Passed by the Senate April 29, 1949. The National School Health Services Act. Furnishes aid for the improvement of school health services.

Scientific research, scholarships, etc.: S. 247. Approved May 10, 1950. Public Law 507. The National Science Foundation Act. Establishes such Foundation to develop and encourage the pursuit of a national policy for research and education in the sciences; to initiate, support, and coordinate scientific research and, among other things, to grant scholarships and fellowships for scientific study at accredited nonprofit American and foreign institutions.

Veterans, extension of benefits: S. 672. Passed by Senate August 9, 1949. Provides that educational benefits for World War II veterans may be based on any period of enlistment or reenlistment contracted on or before October 6, 1945.

Veterans, industrial and institutional trade training: H. R. 5833. Passed by House August 25, 1949. Provides, for the purpose of clarification, that public-school courses in vocational training shall be deemed institutional training, rather than training on the job, for purposes of veterans' educational benefits.

Veterans, selection of courses: S. 2596. Approved July 13, 1950. Public Law 610. Make a number of amendments to Veterans Regulation 1 (a), relating to the education of veterans, in order to limit and define the authority of the Administrator to deny or control the selection of courses; to establish rules for the determination of a school's customary cost of tuition, to define full-time course for trade and technical schools, etc.

Veterans' vocational rehabilitation: S. 3499. Reported in the Senate August 14, 1950. Provides that persons qualified to receive vocational rehabilitation under Veterans Regulation 1 (a) [pt. VII] shall be entitled to such training for a period not less than the period of education and training to which they would be entitled under part VIII.

Legislative Record, Committee on Rules, Eighty-first Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 2, 1951

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in order to acquaint the membership of the House with the activity of the Committee on Rules during the Eighty-first Congress, under permission granted me heretofore there is listed below the House and Senate bills, concurrent and joint resolutions upon which rules were granted, together with the House resolutions favorably reported to the House. A careful study of this compilation will convince even the most skeptical that the committee was exceedingly active in expediting vital legislation to the floor of the House where the membership was extended the privilege and the right to express itself thereon. Notwithstanding the volume of work and definite action indicated in the list below, considerable difficulty was experienced in the committee in securing favorable action upon a number of requests for rules on legislation of great import. In eight instances where the committee failed to act, or failed to grant a rule requested by the chairman of a legislative committee the so-called 21-day rule was resorted to to bring important measures before the House. This rule was utilized on the following bills:

H. R. 3199, House Resolution 276: Abolition of poll tax.

H. R. 5472, House Resolution 302: Rivers and harbors, flood control.

House Joint Resolution 334, House Resolution 350: United States participation in international organizations.

H. R. 331, House Resolution 217: Statehood for Alaska.

H. R. 49, House Resolution 218: Statehood for Hawaii.

H. R. 4846. House Resolution 321; National Science Foundation.

S. 2105, House Resolution 419: Mining Bill.

H. R. 5965, House Resolution 348: Veterans' hospital bill.

As a result the membership of this House was permitted to express its views and its wishes through a record vote on these important legislative proposals. With the repeal of this democratic process in the rules of the House, adopted by the liberal majority in the Eighty-first Congress, the membership of the Eighty-second Congress will undoubtedly be deprived of this same opportunity and right to pass on critical legislation through a coalition of six or more members of the Committee on Rules who might arrogate unto themselves the power to determine what vital legislation should or should not receive consideration by this great legislative body.

A total of 217 bills and resolutions were acted on by the committee during the two sessions of the Eighty-first Congress.

One hundred and seventy-two rules were granted on general legislation. Eleven House and Senate joint resolutions were granted rules. Sixteen House resolutions were reported favorably. Four House concurrent resolutions were granted rules. Three requests for rules on major legislation were denied, two of which were later brought to the floor of the House under the 21-day rule, while hearings were held on a number of other requests for rules on important legislation which failed of final action.

The following compilation shows the resolution, bill, joint or concurrent resolution number involved, the subject matter of the legislation, the date reported by the Committee on Rules, and the resolution number assigned to the measure:
